inspired; believers received and possessed "the adoption of children;" and had the liberty and privileges of adults, instead of the restraints and rigorous subjection of minors. And, because this was the state of the Gentile as well as the Jewish converts, "God had sent forth" the Holy Spirit, given through his Son, to quicken, seal, and comfort them, as his beloved children; enabling and encouraging them, with filial love and confidence, to call upon him as their Father, to whatever nation they belonged. Seeing therefore the apostle hoped that this was the case of the Galatians in general, though there might be exceptions, (for he addressed them individually,) every person of this character, of whatever country or language, was no longer "a servant," to worship and obey God from slavish fear or mercenary hope; "but a son," and an heir of heaven through Christ, to walk with him in love, filial reverence, and confidence. (Note, Rom. 8:14—17.)

8 Howbeit, then <sup>s</sup> when ye knew not God, <sup>t</sup> ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods.

9 But now, after that <sup>u</sup> ye have known God, or rather <sup>x</sup> are known of God, <sup>y</sup> how turn ye * again to the weak and beggarly † elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The preceding argument fully proved, that even Jewish converts were redeemed from the yoke of the ceremonial law, as well as from the curse of the covenant of works. How absurd then would it be, for Gentiles to adopt that abrogated system! The Galatians had formerly been ignorant of "the one living and true God," and had then performed religious service to mere creatures, or imaginary beings, "which by nature are not gods;" and mere external observances might well accord to such objects of worship. But, having at length been brought to the knowledge of God, by their conversion to Christianity; or rather having been thus "known" and owned by him, by their admission into the Christian church, and the spiritual gifts bestowed on them; could they think of turning again to carnal services, similar to those which they had forsaken, as if desirous of being in bondage to them? (Marg. Ref. s —z.—Notes, 1 Cor. 8:4—6. 12:1—3.) The ceremonies of the Mosaic law were mere "rudiments" of religious knowledge, suited to the childhood of the church: they were, in themselves, weak and inefficacious, low and "poor;" and thus incapable of communicating spiritual riches to mankind: and after the coming of the Messiah, having lost all their use and obligation, they became as worthless even as the superstitions of Paganism; so that when put in the place of Christ, they were equally inconsistent with true religion. (Note, 1—3.) In this sense alone could the Galatians be said "to turn again to the weak and beggarly elements;" for they had not before been under the ceremonial law: but, when delivered from idolatry, they were about to substitute the abrogated ceremonial law in the place of the heathen superstitions; and to bring themselves into bondage to Judaizing teachers and pharisaical traditions, after having been emancipated from the Pagan priests. Their observation of the sabbaths, new moons, festivals, and sabbatical years, as prescribed in the law, had the appearance of apostasy to Judaism; so that the apostle was afraid that they would totally depart from the faith, and that his labors for their eternal salvation would be in vain.—Ye knew not God. (8) Notes, 1 Chr. 22:6—10, v. 9. I answer, 'such they were become indeed, when Christ 'was once come; ... when the grace signified in 'them was brought out into the light, when the 'inwrapped promises were unfolded and revealed; they were then as empty shells, and like 'carcasses whose soul was gone. So long as a 'shell contains a kernel unseen, so long it is full; 'when it comes forth to outward view, then the 'shell is empty. Even so it is with the elements 'of the law.' Mede.—The best illustration of the absurd conduct, which the apostle ascribes to the Galatians, may be found in the church of Rome, in which the worship of saints and angels succeeded to that of the inferior deities; the superstitious and often licentious festivals multiplied among them, to those which had been used in Pagan Rome. In short, almost every part of the idolatrous worship of Pagan Rome has its counterpart in that of Antichristian Rome: this may be clearly perceived by any man, who will take the pains to compare many passages in Virgil, and other Latin and Greek poets, with the rituals of the church of Rome.

12 ¶ Brethren, I beseech you, <sup>e</sup> be as I am; for I am as ye are: <sup>d</sup> ye have not injured me at all.

14 And my temptation which was in my flesh <sup>g</sup> ye despised not, nor rejected; but received me as <sup>h</sup> an angel of God, even <sup>i</sup> as Christ Jesus.

15 * Where is then <sup>k</sup> the blessedness ye spake of? <sup>l</sup> for I bear you record, that, <sup>m</sup> if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me.

16 Am I therefore <sup>n</sup> become your enemy, <sup>o</sup> because I tell you the truth?

Note.—“The apostle tempers whatever he might seem to have said more sharply than usual, by an admirable, and therefore no doubt a divine management: so declaring his good will to the Galatians; that when they read it, ‘unless they were wholly desperate, they could not but acknowledge his lenity with tears.’ Beza.—Being desirous of considering the Galatians as his brethren in Christ, he affectionately entreated them to “be as he was;” as cordial in their love to him, as he was in his love to them; or rather, of one mind with him, respecting justification and the Mosaic law: for “he was as they were;” though he had been “zealous for the law;” (as they were now become!) yet he now trusted only in Christ; and put no more confidence in the law, than if he had been a Gentile: and he entreated them in this to imitate him. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 2:11—16. 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) He did not charge them with having at all “injured him,” or speak any thing out of resentment; though they had wronged themselves in departing from his doctrine. They remembered his first coming among them; when his bodily infirmities seemed to unfit him for preaching the gospel, or likely to render his ministry unacceptable: yet he was enabled to proceed, though greatly tried and tempted and discouraged. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Note, 1 Cor. 2:3—5.) They had not, however, despised him on that account, or rejected his testimony: but, seeing that his doctrine was confirmed by undeniable proofs, and feeling its energy on their hearts and consciences, they received him; though thus infirm and tempted, even as if he had been an angel sent from God, or as if Christ himself had come in person to preach to them. Doubtless the apostle here spake of “his thorn in the flesh;” which must therefore have been some perceivable infirmity, that exposed him to inward temptations, and to the contempt of his enemies: and indeed it is absurd to explain this of his persecutions, which were no plausible reason why he should be despised, but the contrary. (Marg. Ref. g—i.—Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.)—“Where was then the felicity” of which they spake, as communicated by the hope and comforts of the gospel? What was the nature of it? What must now have become of that “blessedness,” that they should after all have recourse to the legal covenant, which could only enslave and condemn them? Their inward satisfaction and consolation in Christ had formerly so inspired them with love to his minister, that the apostle bare them testimony, that they were “willing even to pluck out their eyes, and to give them to him;” if this could possibly have removed his infirmities, or conduced to his benefit. (Marg. Ref. l—m.) And was he so soon become their enemy? the object of their aversion and resentment? If so, it must be because he had persisted in telling them the truth, both in respect of the way of salvation, and of their perilous deviation from it.

Some copies read, “they would exclude us;” they wanted to alienate the Christians in Galatia from the apostle, that they might possess an undivided authority over them from carnal motives. But instead of showing so zealous an attachment to these deceivers, who had supplanted the apostle in their affections; it would be good for the Galatians to be constantly “zealous in a good thing,” even for the truth and cause of pure Christianity; and not only while he continued among them, as had been the case with many of them. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Note, Phil. 2:12,13.)—He must, however, consider them as “his dear children,” though in a state of infantine weakness: (Note, 1 Cor. 4:14—17.) and as he had labored and suffered greatly in earnestly seeking their conversion from idolatry; so he might be said “a second time to travail in birth” for them. (Note, Is. 53:11,12.) He was as earnest for their recovery from their present delusion, as he had been for their conversion from idolatry. His heart was even filled with anguish from his anxiety about them; and he suffered pangs, like those of a travailling woman, which seemed as if they must continue, till “Christ was formed in them,” in proof that they had “put on Christ” as their robe of righteousness: for their legal observances were no more like the genuine holiness and obedience of true believers, than their legal dependence resembled “the faith of God’s elect.” (Marg. Ref. s—u.) He therefore longed to be with them, that he might witness this happy change; and that he might alter his words of reproof, for those of encouragement and commendation; or change his voice, as different circumstances and characters should require, which could not so well be done in an epistle. For he stood in “doubt of them,” or hesitated, as to what he ought to think of them, whether they had been truly converted, or not; and he was anxious to know what the event of their present delusions would be. (Marg. Ref. x.)

Note.—Many of the Galatians absurdly desiring “to be under the law” of Moses, from a mistaken interpretation of the Old Testament; the apostle demanded, whether they did not observe what was “written in the law,” or in the books of Moses. (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, John 10:32—39. 12:34—36. 15:22—25. Rom. 3:19,20.) For the history of Abraham contained an apt emblem of the two covenants. (Notes, Ex. 19:5. Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13.) Ishmael was born of Hagar, in the ordinary course of nature, and in consequence of a carnal project: (Notes, Gen. 16:) but Isaac was born of Sarah, a free-woman, the wife of Abraham, by the miraculous performance of God’s promise, when she was naturally past child-bearing. (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Notes, Gen. 17:15—21. 18:9—15. 21:1—7. Rom. 4:15—22.) These things were an allegory of the Sinai-covenant; and of that made with Abraham in Christ for the benefit of all believers.

(Marg. Ref. e.—Note, 3:15—22.) All those Israelites, who were not by faith interested in the covenant made with Abraham, were indeed outwardly a part of Abraham's family, and of the visible church: but, like Ishmael, they were born in servitude, all their obedience was of a slavish nature, and their privileges were external and temporal: nor could the Sinai-covenant deliver them from this state. For "Hagar, the bond-woman," was the emblem of mount Sinai, in the deserts bordering on Arabia, which country was afterwards peopled by her descendants, being without the boundaries of the promised land. From that mountain the law was given, and there the legal covenant was ratified. It therefore corresponded to Jerusalem and its inhabitants, as the outward worshippers of God, in the ordinances performed at the temple. For as far as they continued under the Sinai-covenant, especially when they had rejected Christ and the gospel, they were mere slaves, influenced by the "spirit of bondage," and not the children of God. (Marg. Ref. f—n.—Notes, 8—11. Rom. 8:14—17.) But "the heavenly Jerusalem," the true church as coming from above, espoused to Christ, and represented by Sarah, is in a state of freedom; and this church is the mother of all true believers, who are "born of the Spirit." (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, Heb. 12:22—25. Rev. 21:1—4,9—27.) That this church should mainly consist of Gentile converts, had long before been figuratively predicted. (Marg. Ref. r—t.—Note, Is. 54:1.)—Believers therefore, whether Jews or Gentiles, like Isaac, were "the children of promise:" (Note, Rom. 9:6—9.) they were not only brought into the church, as descended from Abraham, or proselyted to an external profession: but they were by regeneration, and through faith, made a part of the true seed of Abraham, in virtue of the promise made to him, that "in his Seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed." (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, 3:26—29. Rom. 4:9—17.) But, as Ishmael, a slave on his mother's side by birth, and in no wise entitled to the inheritance, had mocked and persecuted Isaac, who was miraculously born of Sarah according to the promise, to be Abraham's heir; so the Jews, who continued voluntarily in bondage under the legal covenant, at that time persecuted the Christians, who were "born after the Spirit," as Abraham's seed, according to the true meaning of the sacred oracles, and to whom alone true liberty and the heavenly inheritance belonged. But, as the Galatians might read in the scripture, that God himself had commanded Hagar and Ishmael to be sent away from Abraham's family, that "the son of the bond-woman" might not share the inheritance with Isaac; even so the Jewish nation would soon be cast out of the church, and all who continued under the legal covenant would be excluded from heaven. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Note, Gen. 21:8—13.) If then the exclusive privileges of all believers were immensely superior, according to the new covenant; what an absurdity was it for the Gentile converts to "desire to be under the law," which could not deliver the unbelieving Jews either from bondage or condemnation!—We should not perhaps have discovered this allegory, in the history of Sarah and Hagar, if the apostle had not shown it to us; and much sobriety and discretion ought to be used in thus applying scriptural narrations: yet this transaction was so remarkable, the coincidence so exact, and the illustration so instructive, that we cannot doubt it originally was intended by the Holy Spirit, as an allegory and type of those things, to which the inspired apostle referred it: and it should be observed, that it was adduced, as an illustration of the subject under consideration, and not as a direct argument, or proof of it.—Rejoice thou barren, &c. (27) From the LXX, which accord to the Hebrew. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

While we are or ought to be thankful for deliverance from "the elements of this world," by the light, liberty, and privileges of the gospel; we should cheerfully submit to the restraints and corrections of our heavenly Father, in this our state of education for perfect felicity; and patiently wait the time appointed by him for our admission to it: and we ought to delight in the "easy yoke" of our Redeemer, whose service is perfect freedom." (Note, Matt. 11:28—30.) For who can enough admire the condescending compassion of the Son of God, in "being born of a woman, and made under the law;" that, by obedience unto the death upon the cross, he might redeem us wretched rebels from every fatal curse, galling yoke, and slavish terror: that so we might "receive the redemption of children;" and "the Spirit of adoration," emboldening us to worship God as our Father, to walk with him in holy communion, and to rejoice in the hope of his everlasting felicity? May we, by this filial temper and conduct, at all times evince our adoption; and may "the Holy Spirit thus witness with our Spirit, that we are the children and heirs of God!"—Once "we knew not God:" and though outward circumstances kept most of us from gross idolatry; yet we idolized the world, and sought our happiness from it. If then we now so "know God" in Christ, as to reverence, love, trust, and obey him; it is the effect of his knowledge of us, as the objects of his choice, and owning us as ransomed by the blood of his Son. (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 2 Tim. 2:19.) What then have we to do any more with worldly idols? What occasion for superstitious and human inventions, as if we desired to be still in bondage? Surely all those things must be "weak and beggarly elements," which God has no where required of us!

(Note, Col. 2:8—23.) And though Christians may “observe a day to the Lord;” yet an evident and zealous attachment to things of this nature, may well induce a fear concerning men’s spiritual state: (Note, Rom. 14:5,6.) and it should always be remembered, that if ministers lose their faithful labors, their hearers lose their precious souls. Idolatry consists in “worshipping what by nature is no God:” surely then the worship of saints and angels is turning again to heathenism; and every scriptural example of worship rendered to Christ, demonstrates that he is, “by nature,” “God over all blessed for evermore.”

V. 12—20.

Ministers ought, as much as possible, to wave their personal complaints against their people; and to show more fear lest they should injure themselves, than lest they should behave amiss to them. It behoves us, when we think ourselves unkindly treated, to recollect the instances, in which we experienced the candor and affection of our hearers; and when they overlooked those infirmities and defects, if not instances of misconduct, which we feared would have occasioned the rejection of our message. We may also remind them, when they seem about to turn aside, of those tender and sweet seasons, when they welcomed the gospel as preached by such poor worms, as if an angel, or “even Christ himself,” had spoken to them; and when their hearts were so full of “blessedness,” that they scarcely knew how sufficiently to express their gratitude, even to the instruments of their hopes and consolations. Contrasting these happy seasons with that coldness and disaffection, which too frequently follow without any apparent reason; we may with efficacy inquire, “what is become of their blessedness;” and whether we be looked on as enemies, because we tell them the truth. Alas! this is often the case, not only with false professors of the gospel, but even with misguided believers; when for a time they are seduced by those who “zealously affect them, but not well;” who would alienate them from their faithful pastors, to attach them to themselves; or who would even disregard their souls and their eternal salvation, to promote their own credit, or that of their party. At such times, the most affectionate warnings and scriptural arguments, generally give offence, and increase alienation. This is a most trying situation to the faithful minister. He cannot cease to feel for his deluded children, and to long after them. Though he could bear to lose their affections, he cannot be willing that they should lose their souls: he must remind them that their zealous affections should be towards more substantial good, than new notions and new teachers; as in the sight of God, and not merely in the presence of their ministers. Thus many know experimentally something of the apostle’s meaning when he said, “that he travailed in birth again,” of his spiritual children, till “Christ was formed in them;” as the anguish on account of those who they had hoped were converted, is greater than their earnestness for their conversion; and their prayers and endeavors are more fervent, as fearing “lest their last state should be worse than the first.” (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. 2 Pet. 2:20—22.)—Nothing is so sure a proof of a sinner’s justification, as “Christ formed in him” by the renewal of the Holy Spirit: but this cannot be hoped for, while men depend on the law for acceptance with God. (Notes, Rom. 6:14,15. 7:1—6. 2 Cor. 13:5,6.) The faithful minister “desires to change his voice” of reproof, for that of commendation; and not only to instruct, but to speak confidently of those, concerning whom he stands in doubt; and who, therefore, certainly ought to stand in doubt of themselves.

V. 21—31.

Those “who desire to be under the law,” should hear what the law says to them: and this would in every case teach them to flee from it, to the grace of the gospel. For not only do allegories and types instruct us; but the plainest language imaginable declares the two covenants, that from Sinai and that of Christ, to be perfectly distinct, and even of opposite tendency, to those who now are under them. They who are “born of the flesh,” whether of Jewish or Christian parents, but not “of the Spirit;” (Note, John 3:3—11.) and who in any degree depend for justification on circumcision, baptism, or any personal obedience whatsoever; or even on creeds, however scriptural; or on being members of this or the other church however excellent, are under the covenant of works, mere Ishmaelites, bond-slaves, citizens of the earthly Jerusalem, but under condemnation. But those who “are born of the Spirit,” and so believe in Christ, trusting only in his merits and grace, are the “children of the promise,” and of the heavenly Jerusalem; they possess true liberty, and are the heirs of everlasting felicity. Millions have already been thus “born of God,” in the Gentile world, which once lay desolate: and we should pray, and do what we can in every way, that such places as still continue barren, (alas, how numerous and extensive!) may speedily produce far more converts, than have yet been made in the most flourishing churches: and especially, that Israel may speedily be gathered from his abject state which shall be “as life from the dead” to the nations of the earth.—If indeed we are “the children of promise” and heirs of the inheritance; we need not wonder that carnal Ishmaels mock and persecute us: so it has been, and so it will be. But let us rest our souls on the scripture, and, by an evangelical hope and a cheerful obedience, let us show that we are the children of God, that we walk at liberty, and that our conversation and our treasure are indeed in heaven.

CHAP. V.

The apostle exhorts the Galatians, to stand fast in their Christian liberty; and shows that, by being circumcised they would in fact renounce Christ; as in him “nothing availeth but faith which worketh by love.” 1—6. He disclaims the preaching of circumcision himself, and condemns it in others, 7—12. He cautions them not to abuse their liberty, but “by love to serve one another;” for “love is the fulfilling of the law.” 13—15. Exhorting them “to walk in the Spirit,” he states the conflict between the flesh and the spirit, 16—18. He enumerates the works of the flesh, and the fruits of the Spirit, 19—23. He shows that true Christians have “crucified the flesh;” again calls on the Galatians to walk in the Spirit; and warns them against vain glory and envy, 24—26.

2 Beheld, <sup>d</sup> I Paul say unto you, <sup>e</sup> that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.

3 For I <sup>f</sup> testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is <sup>g</sup> a debtor to do the whole law.

Note.—Christ had called the churches in Galatia, by his gospel, to partake of liberty from condemnation and from the ceremonial law, as well as from their former idolatries and slavery to sin and Satan: (Marg. Ref. a, b.) the apostle therefore exhorted them to “stand fast in that liberty,” whatever efforts were used to deprive them of it; and not to suffer the Judaizing teachers to entangle them in a yoke of bondage under the ceremonial law; which would reduce them again into as abject a slavery, as that of their Gentile state. (Note, 4:8—11, 21—31.) For he, Paul, though opposed to many confident teachers who maintained the contrary, most decidedly and solemnly assured them, that if they submitted to circumcision, as necessary to justification, they would derive no benefit from Christ and his covenant; or from his righteousness, atonement, and mediation: and he again testified to every individual among them, who should be circumcised from such motives, that “he was become” a debtor to “keep the whole law,” and liable to condemnation for every failure in his obedience to it. (Notes, 1:6—10. 3:6—14.)—Perhaps some taught them, that the most burdensome parts of the law were not obligatory on proselytes, who lived at a distance from Jerusalem.—It was however most certain, that Christ would not benefit that man, who brought himself under this obligation, by seeking to be justified on account of his own obedience to the law: as that attempt was in fact a renunciation of the doctrine of grace, a forfeiture of every hope of benefit from the mercy and free favor of God, and a kind of voluntary divorcing himself from Christ, and laying hold of the legal covenant. (Marg. Ref. c—k.) For circumcision, in such circumstances, would be a deliberate renunciation of the covenant of grace: whereas all true Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, being taught by the Holy Spirit, “waited for eternal life,” the proper reward of righteousness, and the object of their hope, as the gift of God by faith in Christ; and not for the sake of their own works in any degree. They not only sought to be, and hoped that they were pardoned and justified in respect of the past and present: but they had the same expectation of the future, and waited for the day of judgment, expecting to be accounted righteous, in Christ, by faith alone, by which they were not only brought into a justified state, but continued in it to the end; and thus entitled to the heavenly inheritance. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Notes, Rom. 5:1, 2. 2 Cor. 5:5—8, v. 7. Jude 20, 21.) For, according to the new covenant, and in respect of those who were members of the Christian church, “neither circumcision nor uncircumcision were of any avail:” the Jewish convert might observe the legal ceremonies, or he might assert his liberty from them; the Gentile might utterly disregard them, or from motives of expediency he might be circumcised as Timothy had been, and pay some attention to them; provided he did not count them obligatory on his conscience, or place any dependence on them. But these things were of no avail: “in Christ Jesus.” They could not profit an unbeliever: nor prevent the salvation of a believer; whatever purpose might in other respects be answered by either the one or the other. True faith alone received the Saviour, and interested the believer as one with Christ in his whole salvation: and this living and justifying faith was distinguished from a dead faith, by being an operative active principle; and especially as it always showed its energy in the heart, by love to Christ, his cause, and his people; by love to God, and to man for his sake: and this never failed to produce its correspondent effects on a person’s conduct. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, 6:15, 16. 1 Cor. 7:17—24, v. 19. Jam. 2:14—26. 1 John 5:1—5.) By this view of the subject, a simple dependence on the righteousness and atonement of Christ, and an evangelical obedience to his commandments are at once secured: and the fruits of that love, by which “faith worketh,” will be adduced at the day of judgment, as evidences to prove believers entitled to the heavenly inheritance. (Note, Matt. 25:34—46.)—After what the apostle had before said, (2—4.) this conclusion fully proves, that he did not oppose the observance of the ceremonial law, as evil in itself: but as their dependence on it was wholly incompatible with the method of justification revealed in the gospel.—It is to be noted, that circumcision is here to be considered, partly from the circumstances of the times, (when it had ceased to be “the seal of the righteousness of faith,” as by baptism it was abolished,) and partly from the sentiments of these adversaries, who were desirous to connect it with Christ, as if some part of salvation resided in it. Beza. ‘If the whole confidence of the soul do not rest on him for salvation; he will reject those divided regards which are offered to him, and interpret them as an affront, rather than an acceptable homage.’ Doddridge.—‘It is not easy to perceive, how they should have justification and salvation from him, from whom, after the rev-

11 And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased.

12 I would they were even cut off which trouble you. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—When the gospel had first been received by the Galatians, they seemed in a very promising manner to "run the race set before them;" professing, and apparently exercising that "faith which worketh by love," and obeying Christ from evangelical principles. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—27. 2 Tim. 4:6—8. Heb. 12:1.) But they were now evidently "hindered," and turned aside from this obedience of faith and love, to ceremonial observances and dependence on the law. But who had thus "driven them back;" from the way of Christ, into these new and unauthorized paths? or, come across them in the course, and turned them out of it? "This persuasion" of the necessity of circumcision, certainly did not come from the apostle, who had "called them to the grace of Christ;" nor was it from the Holy Spirit, the Agent in the sinner's conversion. (Notes, 1:6—10. 3:1—5.) In fact, a few Judaizers had crept in among them, who, being infected with pride, bigotry, and enmity against the pure gospel of Christ, had "leavened" them also with a similar spirit; its baleful influence was rapidly diffusing itself through all their churches, and would have most fatal effects, unless most decidedly counteracted. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Notes, Matt. 16:5—12. 1 Cor. 5:6—8.

15:31—34.) The apostle, however, reflecting on the manner in which they had received his doctrine, and trusting in the Lord Jesus, still had a confidence in them, that they would recover from the temporary fascination, and become entirely of his judgment on the subject. Then the ring-leader of the defection, or any other person who had perverted them, (of whatever importance he had seemed to be,) would be justly censured by them, and bear that condemnation from them which he deserved; as assuredly he would from God, unless he were brought to repentance. (Marg. Ref. u—z.) Indeed, it had been craftily and maliciously insinuated, that the apostle himself after his journey to Jerusalem, and his conference with the other apostles, on some occasions preached the necessity of circumcision, when it conducted to increase his influence; and for this, his candid allowance to men's prejudices, when it could be safely done, and the circumcision of Timothy, might give the handle: but if this had been his practice, why did he every where meet with such furious persecution from the Jews? For in that case, the offence of the cross of Christ would have in a great measure ceased. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) Had he proselyted the Gentiles to the Mosaic law, and taught justification by it; the Jews, the grand point in contest being thus conceded, would have connived at his regard to Jesus of Nazareth, being gratified in their self-preference, and in the increasing number of those who observed the law; but his preaching Christ as the whole salvation of sinners; his disregard to the ritual law; his doctrine of justification, which left all unbelievers under condemnation without distinction, and his success among the Gentiles, whom he would not allow to be circumcised, every where exasperated the Jews against him. As then this insinuation was notoriously false; so he ardently desired that the persons who thus troubled them, and employed such manifest deceits for that purpose, were cut off by excommunications from their society; and so kept from doing them any further mischief. But why did he not command the Galatians to excommunicate them, as he had required the Corinthians to deliver the incestuous person to Satan. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5:1—5,9—13. 2 Cor. 2:5—11.) It is probable, because the infection had spread so wide in the churches of Galatia, the persons to be censured possessed so great influence, and so very many were concerned in some degree, that there was little prospect, except by the intervention of miracles, that such a command would be obeyed. Their crime, likewise, however ruinous to themselves and others, was of a more plausible nature, than the scandalous conduct of the incestuous Corinthian.—It is also to be noted, that the apostle did not command the Corinthians to excommunicate the false teachers, though he most decidedly testified against them. (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) In both cases, having intimated their duty, he waited a more favorable opportunity of interposing his own authority.

13 ¶ For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another.

Note.—The Galatians had been "called unto liberty," and ought not to endure those who attempted to bring them into bondage: only let them be careful not to run into licentiousness, or to take "occasion from their liberty" to indulge the inclinations of corrupt nature. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Note, 1 Pet. 2:13—17.) "Faith working by love" would indeed, as far as it prevailed, lead them to serve and worship God as his children: and love to their brethren and to all men, for Christ's sake and after his example, ought to make them willing "servants to each other," and induce them to give up their own inclinations and indulgence, to promote the welfare of their brethren, as far as in their power; without doing any one harm, in his person, connexions, property, reputation, or peace of mind. (Notes, Ex. 20:13—17. Matt. 20:24—28. 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) For the whole moral law contained no more, in all its requirements, than was implied in "love," especially the whole of men's duty to one another was summed up in the single precept of "loving their neighbors as themselves:" (Marg. Ref. g—i.—Notes, Lev. 19:18. Rom. 13:8—10.) and this still continued to be their rule of duty, though they were delivered from the law as a covenant. But if, on the contrary, they indulged selfishness, pride, and anger, by dividing into parties and quarrelling with each other, as if like wild beasts, they would "bite and devour one another;" they might expect to be left by the God of peace and love, to be the instruments of each other's present misery or future destruction. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Jam. 3:13—16. 4:1—3.)—"The zeal of the Jews would not suffer an uncircumcised person to live among them; so might it be also with these zealous Judaizers."—Whitby.

16 This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

17 For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

18 But if ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—To prevent the ruinous consequences of contentions to themselves and others, and the disgrace which they brought on the gospel; the apostle called on the Galatians "to walk in the Spirit;" according to his holy guidance, in dependence on his influences, and with constant prayer for them. This would effectually prevent them from "fulfilling the lusts," or desires, of the flesh, or that evil nature with which they were born, as descended from fallen Adam. (Marg. Ref. i—n.)—"According to his manner, the apostle calls that part of a man "the spirit," which is newly quickened by the Holy Spirit, "which is dead unto sin, and alive unto God;" "... and "the flesh," whatever in man is not renewed by grace, through Christ, as apprehended by faith. He here justly adds, that in the same regenerate man is both "flesh and spirit;" "the conflict between which is copiously shown in the seventh chapter of the Romans." Beza. "For the flesh," "the old man," "lusteth" in direct opposition to the desires of the new nature in the regenerate, as well as to the dictates of the Holy Spirit: and "the spirit," in both senses, opposes the corrupt desires of the flesh, by holy affections and inclinations. These are therefore placed in direct opposition to each other: so that believers "do not the things which they would," according to the most literal meaning of the words. They are not so holy as they long to be; nor yet, though at liberty from the covenant of works, do they indulge those corrupt inclinations, which still rise up in their hearts, and cause them much trouble, distress, and perplexity. Thus they are engaged in a perpetual conflict, in which they earnestly desire that grace may obtain a complete and speedy victory. And those who thus give themselves up "to be led by the Spirit," "are not under the law," nor exposed to its awful curse for every failure in obedience; while their hatred of sin and desires after holiness, according to the perfect rule of God's commandments, is the evidence that they are interested in the salvation of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. o-s.—Notes, Rom. 7:7—25. 8:1—17.)—The apostle, in his epistle to the Romans, says, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the Sons of God." Here he says, "If ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law." Hence it follows, that they, who are "not under the law" are "the sons of God."—"Ye will 'not gratify the lusts of your animal nature; 'particularly ye will not gratify the sinful passions, of envy, malice, anger, revenge.' Mack-night.—Do 'envy, malice, anger, revenge,' belong to the animal nature? Is the devil then, in this sense, an animal? In fact all sin has its source and seat in the soul, and the body, even in gross sensual indulgences, is only "the instrument of unrighteousness to sin." Walk in the Spirit. (16) Πνευματι περιπατετε. 5,25.—As πνευματι is without the article, it properly signifies, as Beza explains it, that which "is born of the Spirit, and is spirit;" yet this does not alter the meaning of the exhortation, as when we are influenced by this new principle, we walk in dependence on the Holy Spirit, who both communicated it, preserves it, and works in and by it.—Are contrary. (17) Αντικειται. 20 Idolatry, <sup>x</sup> witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, <sup>y</sup> heresies, 21 Envyings, murders, <sup>z</sup> drunkenness, <sup>a</sup> revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, <sup>b</sup> that they which do such things shall not <sup>c</sup> inherit the kingdom of God.

Note.—The difference between "the flesh and the spirit" might be known by their contrary effects. (Notes, 16—18. John 3:6.) "The works of the flesh" must be "manifest" to every one, who considered the conduct of unconverted men, and the state of the world in general. Several of the sins here specified, as "the works of the flesh," have no connexion with the bodily appetites: which proves, that we are not to understand, by "flesh and spirit," the animal part of man, as distinguished from the intellectual; but the whole of our fallen nature, as opposed to the new nature communicated by regeneration, and the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit acting upon it and by it. (Note, Rom. 8:5—9.) There can be no doubt about "adultery, fornication, &c." being in every sense "works of the flesh." (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Note, 1 Cor. 6:18—20.)—Idolatry also is "a work of the flesh;" as it springs from man's carnal enmity to the holy character, worship, and service of God; in the stead of whom he defies imaginary beings more congenial to himself, and worships them in a manner more suited to his pride and lusts. (Notes, Ex. 20:3. Rom. 1:21—27.) "Witchcraft" (implying all kinds of sorcery, charms, divinations, incantations, fortune-telling, and attempted intercourse with evil spirits, real or pretended,) is "a work of the flesh," as it results from man's carnal dislike of submission to God, and dependence on him, and a desire of seeking help and information from other quarters: by both these, men virtually worship the devil. (Marg. Ref. x.—Note, Ex. 22:18.) "Hatred and variance" are also "works of the flesh;" and "emulations" seem in this connexion to signify that ambition of pre-eminence and thirst for glory, which excite men to vie with one another, and eagerly to aspire after distinction, according to the nature of their objects and pursuits. Poets, orators, historians, philosophers, moralists, and all men, who do not attend to the Bible, deem this the noblest principle of human activity: yet it springs from unmingled pride and selfishness, and is nearly allied to envy. When the object of emulation is evil, its effects are dreadful: when the object is good, the glory of man is sacrilegiously substituted, in the place of the glory of God; and this thirst for human applause has caused more horrible violations of the law of love, and done more to desolate the earth, than even the grossest sensuality ever did. (ηγλοι, Note, Jam. 3:13—16.) Along with "strife, and seditions," by which schisms in the church and factions in the state may be meant, "heresies" are called "works of the flesh." Pride, ambition, avarice, or other carnal affections induce men to pervert the truth of God's words; and, espousing some pernicious error, to seek distinction by propagating it. Hence arise contentions, separations, and the most fatal effects to individuals and to the church. (Notes, 1 Cor. 11:17—22. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) These were therefore joined by the apostle along with adulteries, and unnatural lusts, drunkenness, envy, revellings, seditions, and even murders, as equally the result of a carnal heart, and marks of unregeneracy. Many more he might have mentioned: for covetousness, and the sins connected with it, are elsewhere mentioned; (Note, 1 Cor. 6:9—11.) but these "and such like" would, without repentance and its fruit, certainly exclude men from "inheriting the kingdom of God;" as the apostle had formerly declared to them, and now again forewarned them. (Marg. Ref. z—c.)—The word translated "witchcrafts," is by some rendered poisonings; as if the apostle in this compendium would pause to distinguish one kind of murder from another; when the difference did not at all alter the nature or degree of the crime! "Witchcrafts" had the name used in the original, from the magical compositions of certain ingredients, which attended these diabolical practices.—"Revellings" were such feasts, as were accompanied with music and dancing, and whatever could promote hilarity and sensual gratification. The Greeks and Romans had an imaginary god, called Comus, (from the Greek word here used,) who was supposed to preside over these feasts, and was in that character worshipped by hymns, oblations, and libations. (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:3—7. 1 Pet. 4:3—5.)—The word rendered “lasciviousness” (19), is used by Demosthenes, in describing the enormous ambition and rapacity of Philip king of Macedonia. It seems to denote the exorbitancy of any passion, which is left without restraint; though in scripture it is generally used of unbridled sensual indulgence.

Note.—The holy affections, and the conduct resulting from them, as here enumerated, are not called ‘the works of a believer,’ but ‘the fruit of the Spirit,’ dwelling in the new nature and working by it, which he has produced by regeneration. (Marg. Ref. d.—Note, Eph. 5:8—14, v. 9.) “Love” of God and man, of the Saviour, his people, and all men, for his sake and according to his command and example; a joyful frame of mind in the salvation and service of God; a peaceful conscience, and a submissive will, leading to a peaceable conduct towards man; a disposition to bear injuries and affronts, without seeking revenge or expressing resentment; a mild, unassuming, inoffensive deportment, united with beneficence and philanthropy; truth, sincerity, fidelity, and integrity to man, springing from faith in God and faithfulness to him; a humble, teachable, unambitious temper and demeanor; and an evident moderation about earthly objects, and in respect of every animal indulgence: these, and such like, are “the fruits of the Spirit;” and “against these there is no law,” for they are what the moral law requires. (Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Jam. 3:17,18. 2 Pet. 1:5—7.) So that obedience to the law as a rule, and as “written in the heart” by the Holy Spirit, with delight and satisfaction, and earnest desires after more exact conformity to it, is the apostolical evidence of deliverance from the law, as a covenant of works; and those who really belong to Christ, as justified believers, have actually “crucified the flesh,” with all its corrupt affections and rebellious inclinations. (Marg. Ref. k.) The carnal nature, “the old man,” is dethroned, confined, condemned, hated, opposed, weakened, and wounded: his death is determined, though the execution be lingering and to be effectual only by a continued course of self-denial: and though he still struggles for life, liberty, and even victory; which perpetuates the believer’s conflict, and prevents his complete holiness. But, says the apostle, “if we live in,” or by, “the Spirit,” as regenerate persons; “let us also walk in the Spirit,” and order our daily conversation according to that holy influence, and in dependence on the guidance and powerful assistance of the Holy Spirit: especially in mortifying the desire of “vain glory” and human applause, and refraining from whatever may tend to exasperate the minds of other men; or manifest envy of their gifts, reputation, or prosperity. The “body,” as meaning the animal nature, must be “kept under and brought into subjection,” by proper discipline as a child: but “the flesh,” must be crucified, as an enemy and malefactor, which is doomed to inevitable destruction. (Notes, Rom. 6:5—7. 8:3,4,12,13. 1 Cor. 9:24—27.)

every "yoke of bondage," with which Satan or his ministers may attempt to entangle us. Especially we should regard the apostle's warnings, to keep clear of all dependence on our own works for justification; as in that case "Christ will profit us nothing." It is to be feared, that very large numbers impose on themselves in this matter: they imagine that the merits of Christ will make up for their deficiencies; while their real dependence is placed on their own morality, alms, devotions, or superstitions. But the divine Saviour will teach us to give him the whole honor of our justification, or he will leave us wholly to stand or fall by our own righteousness; and every man, who trusts to his own works, "becomes a debtor to do the whole law;" "Christ becomes of none effect to him;" he virtually renounces the covenant of grace, and will be dealt with according to the rigor of the covenant of works. May we then keep at a distance from this fatal rock, and be of that number, who "through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith!" For the danger of old did not lie in circumcision; circumcision and uncircumcision were immaterial in themselves, even as many external forms and observances now are: but "faith that worketh by love" forms the essence of the religion of Christ. Without this all else is worthless; and compared with it other things are of small value. Yet many, who "seemed to run well" in this evangelical race, have been hindered from obeying the truth, by those who perplexed them with refined notions, or labored to proselyte them to some new sect or form: so that, instead of "the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope," they have turned aside to vain jangling, and zeal for trifling distinctions, and the "shibboleths" of a party. "The persuasion," that religion consists in things of this kind, does by no means accord with the doctrine of the apostles, nor is it from the converting grace of the Spirit. Yet when a little of this leaven gets into even flourishing congregations, it is apt to diffuse itself through "the whole lump." Its first beginnings should therefore be strenuously opposed: and those who would thus unsettle and pervert others, should be censured by their brethren, or even cut off from their communion: and certainly they who persist in disturbing and dividing the church of Christ, must at last "bear their judgment, whosoever they be."

V. 13--18.

It becomes us most steadfastly to maintain the pure gospel of a crucified Saviour, whatever offence may be taken, or persecution endured by means of it; but we should be equally watchful against those who "use their liberty for an occasion to the flesh," and of indulging their sensual or selfish passions. "By love" we should become the willing servants of one another and of all men; and in "loving our neighbor as ourselves," according to the requirement of the holy commandment, we shall most effectually promote our own comfort, and the happiness of families, of the church, and the community. But "a house divided against itself cannot stand;" and when professed Christians, instead of the gentleness of lambs and doves, become like savage beasts of prey, in "biting and devouring one another;" we need not wonder; that they are "consumed one of another." Alas, how has Satan prevailed in this way against the church of Christ! What cruel persecutions and fierce controversies have arisen among Christians, so called! How many hopeful prospects have thus been clouded, and flourishing churches ruined! so that the nominal kingdom of "the Prince of Peace" has become a scene of contention and discord! But all this would have been prevented, if men had "walked in the Spirit;" for they would not then have thus "fulfilled the lusts of the flesh."—The most eminent Christians indeed do not attain to all that they desire and aim at; yet those "who are led by the Spirit," habitually oppose, subdue, and mortify those sinful workings, which they cannot wholly extirpate.

V. 19—26.

It should always be kept in mind that "hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, and envyings," are as much the works of the flesh, as "adulteries, fornications, murders, drunkenness, revellings," or any sensual excess; and that they will as certainly exclude men from heaven, whatever profession of religion they may make; nay, even if religion, in its purest form, is the pretence, subject, or occasion of their malignant passions. The apostle has indeed repeatedly and plainly forewarned us, that they "who do such things," as are here mentioned, or others of a similar nature, "shall not inherit the kingdom of God;" yet what numbers of professed Christians live habitually in the grossest of them; and, notwithstanding their adultery, fornication, shameful uncleanness, or secret lasciviousness, still hope for heaven, in neglect of evangelical repentance and faith! Nor can the most idolatrous covetousness, the most exorbitant pride, ambition, and emulation; the most notorious malice, wrath, hatred, envy; or even the murders, committed in revengeful duels, deprive them of their presumptuous confidence. For "he that believeth not, hath made God a liar." Nay, some even attempt to revive the worship of Satan, by various divinations and prognostications, who would nevertheless be offended to be denied the name of Christians! Many also, who are zealous for the apostle's doctrine of justification, and suppose themselves "not to be under the law;" are so far from being "led by the Spirit," that they are evidently and habitually "fulfilling the lusts of the flesh;" though the feeble remonstrances of a conscience, not totally callous, deceives them into an imagination that they are engaged in the conflict of the flesh and spirit! But let us never forget, that those "who are not under the law" for condemnation, are "led by the Spirit" into the love of its precepts, and an earnest desire to obey them. If we bring forth "the fruits of the Spirit," as here described, in our habitual temper and conduct; we can have no objection to the daily examination of ourselves by that perfect standard of sin and holiness; that our love may be exercised "in knowledge, and in all judgment;" for "against such things there is no law."—Those who "are Christ's" (and all others, however distinguished, belong to Satan's kingdom,) "have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts." Yet the imperfection of our attainments leaves much room both for personal humiliation and mutual exhortations. If then "we live in the spirit," let us also “walk in the spirit;” watching against spiritual pride and vain-glory; not provoking or envying one another, but following after love, and seeking to bring forth more abundantly those “fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God.”

CHAP. VI.

The apostle exhorts the Christians in Galatia, to restore the fallen with meekness, and to bear each other's burdens, according to “the law of Christ,” 1, 2; to beware of self-deception, 3—5; to provide for their teachers; and to persevere without wearying in every good work; being assured that every one will reap as he has sowed, 6—10. He shows the carnal motives and glorying of the Judaizing teachers, 11—13; and determines to “glory in the cross of Christ” alone, by which he is “crucified to the world, and the world to him,” 14. Nothing in Christ avails, but a new creation, 15. He prays for peace on “the Israel of God;” desires that none of them would further trouble him, who, as an old soldier, bore the scars of his warfare; and he commends them to the grace of Christ, 16—17.

5 For <sup>o</sup> every man shall bear his own burden.

Note.—The apostle, having concluded the argumentative part of the epistle, added some particular admonitions before he closed it. If any brother had been or should be surprised into the commission of sin, through unwatchfulness and temptation, and contrary to the habitual tenor of his conduct; “those who were spiritual,” or most matured in judgment and experience, ought to bestow pains to bring him to repentance, and to give him proper counsel and encouragement, in a meek and compassionate spirit, that he might be restored, like a dislocated limb to its place; and not to treat him with harsh rebukes or disdainful neglect. For each of them severally ought to “consider himself,” and his own weakness and frailty; as he too might be tempted and overcome; and then he would need that meekness and sympathy, which he had been backward to exercise towards his offending brother. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—e.) Thus they ought not only to “bear with one another's infirmities;” (Note, Rom. 15:1—3.) but, as fellow-travellers, to carry each other's burdens: while the stronger brother denied himself, in order to support, comfort, and assist the weak, the tempted, and afflicted; (Marg. Ref. f.—Note, Num. 11:11—15, v. 12.) that so, they might fulfil the commandment, which Christ repeatedly gave his disciples, “to love one another, as he had loved them;” and which indeed was the substance of “his law;” for their conduct towards their brethren. (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, John 13:31—35. 15:12—16. 1 John 2:7—11.)—But if, on the contrary, any of them thought himself more wise, strong, or eminent than the rest, on account of his gifts or reputation, and so trusted in himself and despised others; when in fact he was nothing in the school of Christ, having not learned the first lesson of his religion; he was under a grievous and most perilous delusion, his heart imposed on him, and in fact he was his own deceiver. To prevent this fatal mistake, it behoved every individual to “prove his own work” by the touch-stone of the sacred oracles, that he might discover whether his habitual conduct, and the motives of it, accorded to the principles, experience, and character of the true believer: that so, instead of arrogantly condemning others, or glorying in others, and their attachment to him or opinion of him; he might find cause of rejoicing and humble glorying in himself, and in the attestation of the sanctifying Spirit to his faith in Christ. (Marg. Ref. h—n.—Notes, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) For every man must at last stand or fall, not according to the party to which he belonged, or the judgment of men respecting him: but according to his real character in the sight of God. Indeed “every man shall bear his own burden;” so that, if any were deluded into fatal errors by false teachers, he must bear the punishment of his own guilt: nor would the condemnation of the deceiver exculpate the person, who allowed himself to be deceived by him. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, Ez. 14:9—11. 2 Thes. 2:8—12. Rev. 22:14,15.)—The word rendered “spiritual,” when applied to persons, seems to denote the spirituality, or heavenly mind and judgment, of those who are thus distinguished: (Notes, 1 Cor. 2:12—16. 3:1—3. 12:1—3.) and is never used, as I recollect, of men endowed with miraculous gifts. All rulers, teachers, and workers of miracles, were not “spiritual,” spiritually minded, “led by the Spirit,” and filled with “the fruits of the Spirit;” and many private Christians were. The duty of restoring the fallen might belong to the teachers and rulers primarily, but not exclusively.—Some indeed suppose, that persons endowed with spiritual gifts superintended the churches for some time, without any regular appointment; and that there were no other bishops or elders in Galatia at this time, as little mention is made of them (6): but this by no means agrees with the history, which mentions the ordaining of elders by the apostles, “in every city;” either personally, if they had leisure, or by apostolical men, or evangelists, (as Timothy, Titus, and others,) if compelled previously to leave the new converts. It is, however, probable, that these elders, and the deacons also, were generally chosen from among

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Lord had appointed the office of the ministry, for the conversion of sinners and the edification of believers: and accordingly the apostle exhorted the Galatians to contribute to the comfortable maintenance of their teachers, who instructed them from the word of God; communicating to them a proportion of their temporal good things, according to their ability. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, 1 Cor. 9:4-18.) In this and all things of this kind, they must be careful "not to be deceived" by their own hearts, by Satan, or by false teachers: for, however they might excuse themselves or impose upon men, and then deride their simplicity and credulity; God was not to be thus deceived or mocked; as men often impose on others with false pretences, and then ridicule their folly and credulity. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) But it was most certain, that every man would at length "reap" a harvest correspondent to what he sowed. "He that sowed to the flesh," by continuing to fulfil its lusts, and to indulge his selfish and sensual desires even under the profession of the gospel, would reap only the corruptible things of this world; his body, which he indulged and pampered, would soon turn to corruption in the grave; and he himself would perish, as unregenerate and having no inheritance in heaven. But the man who "sowed to the spirit," and under the influences of the Holy Spirit exercised daily repentance, faith in Christ, love to him and his brethren, and other Christian graces; would not only here reap the earnest and first-fruits of inward consolations; but at length inherit everlasting life, as trained up for it by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and as receiving for Christ's sake a proportionable gracious recompense of all his disinterested and faithful services. (Marg. Ref. s-y.—Notes, Prov. 11:18,24,25. Ec. 11:1-6. Matt. 25:34-40. 2 Cor. 9:6,7. Heb. 6:9,10.) Let then none "grow weary of doing well," in dependence on Christ and for the honor of his gospel, whatever conflicts, disappointments, persecutions, or temptations they met with: for "in due season," in the time of harvest, they would surely reap an abundant increase of all their labors, self-denial, and expense; if they showed the sincerity of their faith and love, by continuing to the end, "without fainting," in "the work of the Lord." (Marg. Ref. z-c.—Notes, 2 Cor. 4:1,2. 2 Thes. 3:13. Heb. 12:2,3. Jam. 5:7,8.) While therefore their lives were continued, and opportunities afforded; they ought to make it their great business, and deem it their chief pleasure, honor, and advantage, to be "doing good," according to their ability, to men of every description; but especially to those who were their brethren in the family of God, by faith in Christ; or all professed Christians, who showed their sincerity in professing the gospel, by their temper and conduct: for surely, those learned men, who would substitute the word profession, instead of "faith in Christ," do not mean to include such as evidently make a hypocritical profession. (Marg. Ref. d-f.)

Note.—The words here rendered, “how large a letter,” are supposed by many persons to signify with what kind of letters, referring to the apostle’s want of skill and readiness in writing the Greek language. He had, however, bestowed great pains to write the epistle “with his own hand;” either because he had not an amanuensis with him, or rather because he did not choose to employ one; but he wrote the whole himself, that he might convince the Galatians of his love to them, and anxiety about them. (Marg. Ref. g.) There were indeed professed teachers of Christianity, who aimed to “make a fair show in the flesh,” or in respect of external matters, by forming a coalition between the Jewish religion and that of Jesus. (Note, Phil. 3:1–7.) These were so very earnest in urging the Gentiles to be circumcised, that they might be said even to “compel” them; as they would take no denial, and exhausted all their eloquence and ingenuity to overcome their reluctance. But, notwithstanding their attachment to the ritual law, they would not have been so earnest in this matter, if they could otherwise have possessed their influence in the Christian church, without exposing themselves to persecution for professing faith in Christ and his cross. (Marg. Ref. h–k.) For not only did the Jews hate and persecute those, who preached the gospel to the Gentiles without regarding the Mosaic law; but the heathen rulers also, who tolerated the Jews and such Christians as observed the law, were inveterate against the Gentile Christians, and deemed them an upstart sect, dangerous to the civil government. (Notes, 4:17–20. 5:7–12.) This crafty and selfish aim of the Judaizing teachers, of advancing themselves to consideration in the Christian church, without exposing themselves to persecution, induced them to be very zealous in proselyting the Gentiles to the Mosaic law; but they were not equally strict in their own observance of it. Not only were they negligent of the moral precepts; but probably, on one pretence or other, they dispensed with themselves and one another, in respect of the more burdensome and expensive of the ceremonial institutions, many of which could not be observed in countries distant from Jerusalem. (Note, Matt. 23:1–4.) It was therefore evident that they desired the Gentiles to be circumcised, only that they might glory in having induced such numbers, to bear in their flesh this mark of their being proselyted by their means. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Note, Matt. 23:15.) This both placed them at the head of a Christian sect, and also tended to procure them favor and reputation with the Jewish rulers and others. But the apostle added, with a noble disdain of such base motives, “God forbid that I should glory, &c.” he would not value himself on any thing which he had received, attained to, or performed, either before or since his conversion; except in his dependence on the sufferings and death of Christ upon the cross, as a sacrifice for sin; and in the hopes, comforts, and blessings, which he had thence derived. (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Notes, 1 Cor. 1:20–24. 2:1,2.) In this indeed he greatly gloried; and his view of the cross of Christ, and of the obligations, motives, and instructions connected with it, had crucified the world to him, and him to the world. “So that he viewed the world, as little impressed by all its charms, as a spectator would be, by any thing that had been graceful in the countenance of a crucified person, when he beholds it blackened in the agonies of death; and was no more affected by the objects around him, than one that is expiring would be struck with any of those prospects, which his dying eyes might view from the cross, on which he was suspended.” Dodridge. He disdained the friendship, riches, honors, and pleasures of the world, and disregarded its reproach and hatred, as he would have done those of a crucified malefactor; seeing in the cross of Christ the condemnation of all unbelievers without distinction: and the love of all things, of a worldly nature, being crucified by his view of the awful justice and holiness of God even in showing mercy, the evil of sin, the wickedness of man, and the importance of eternity, which the cross of Christ exhibited, and by that grace which he died to procure for him. To show forth the love of his crucified Lord, to point him out to sinners, to honor him in his own conduct, and to teach others to love and glorify him, was the great business of his life: all else was comparatively beneath his notice. (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, Phil. 1:19–26.)

Rom. 14:13–18. 1 Cor. 7:17–24.*) and all things in which true Christians might think or act differently; assured that regeneration, or a new creation to the image of Christ, as evidential of faith in him, was the great distinction be-

Note.—As what had been written was abundantly sufficient to satisfy all humble inquirers; the apostle desired that he might not thenceforth be troubled, and disquieted by such disputations. None ought thus to add to his sufferings; for he already bare in his body the marks and scars of the wounds which he had received in the cause of Christ; and which he deemed far more honorable, than the external badge of circumcision.—Some think, that the marks which slaves and soldiers received, showing to what master or commander they belonged, are alluded to. But the scars of the stripes and wounds which he had received for Christ’s sake, are indisputably meant. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) These ought to have endeared him to them, as he exposed himself to persecution for their good. He therefore desired, that the grace and free favor of Christ might be with their souls, to comfort, establish, and sanctify them; and then he knew, that they would be more affectionate to him, and less attached to abolished externals. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

There is a great difference between those who habitually live in known sin, and such as are “overtaken with a fault,” to which the best of men are liable.—The reality and degree of our spirituality should be evinced, by tender and compassionate endeavors to restore the fallen, and confirm the weak, “in the spirit of meekness;” conscious that we too are liable to be tempted, and have need of humble watchfulness, and constant dependence upon God.—Our Christian liberty is enjoyed, in proportion as we “fulfil the law of Christ,” in loving the brethren, and “bearing one another’s burdens,” with compassion and self-denial.—But alas! many “think themselves to be something when they are nothing, and so deceive themselves.” Let us then “prove our own work;” and seek rejoicing and “glorying in the Lord,” from the assurance of our own conversion, and not in the opinion of others concerning us, or from being attached to the party of any leader; seeing that “every man must bear his own burden.” (Notes, Rom. 14:10—12. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.)—Those who love the gospel, and are taught according to the word of God, will not grudge the faithful minister a proportion of their “good things:” men may, in this and in other matters, impose on others, as well as deceive themselves; but God will not be trifled with.—As the present is our seed time for eternity, let us diligently and impartially examine what we are now sowing; and what our harvest is likely to prove, beseeching also the Lord himself, to search and prove us. (Note, Ps. 139:23,24.) If hitherto any man have “sown to the flesh,” and is afraid that “of the flesh he shall reap corruption;” let him begin, by repentance, faith, and prayer, to “sow to the spirit,” that he may at length reap everlasting life. (Note, Ps. 126:5,6. P. O.) And let none, who have begun thus to “sow to the spirit,” “grow weary in well doing; assured that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.”—For not only do those, who “have no root in themselves,” lose all their labor about religion, by drawing back in the time of temptation; but even believers often lose much of the comfort and usefulness, which they were likely to obtain, by fainting in part, through disappointment, and for want of stronger faith, more fervent zeal, and more patient, persevering hope. Let us then watch against this, remembering that we are the servants of Christ, and that it is our duty, “as we have opportunity, to do good to all men, but especially to the household of faith.”

V 11—18.

There have always been professors and teachers of religion, who “desired to make a fair show in the flesh,” to render religion subservient to worldly interests or distinctions, and to escape the cross. Such men will commonly be more zealous to make proselytes to a party, than converts to Christ; that they may glory in the numbers who are attached to them, and added to their society. But the consistent Christian is nobly disdainful of these low aims: he glories in the cross of Christ alone, as the Foundation of all his hopes; and this faith in a crucified Saviour “crucifies the world to him, and him unto the world;” as he desires to “live no longer to himself, but to him who died for him, and rose again.” (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:26—31, vv. 30,31. 3:18—25. 2 Cor. 5:13—16. 10:17,18.) Thus he overcomes the love of worldly objects, and is reconciled to hardships, poverty, reproach, and hatred for his Lord’s sake. If we then are “in Christ new creatures,” we have the kernel and the substance of religion, and may leave others to contend about the shell or the shadow of it. Yet we should desire “that mercy and peace may be upon all, who walk according to this rule, and upon the whole Israel of God.”—They are peculiarly blameable, who trouble and grieve those soldiers of Christ, that “bear in their bodies” the scars of the wounds, which they have received in “fighting the good fight of faith:” but we should not wonder or be disconcerted, should our most disinterested and self-denying labors meet with this

 TO THE

---

ALTHOUGH it does not appear to have ever been disputed, that the epistle before us was written by St. Paul; yet it is well known, that a doubt has long been entertained concerning the persons to whom it was addressed. The question is founded on some ambiguity in the external evidence. Marcion, a heretic of the second century, as quoted by Tertullian, ... calls it the Epistle to the Laodiceans.—The name, Ephesus, in the first verse, upon which word singly depends the proof that the epistle was written to the Ephesians, is not read in all the manuscripts now extant. I admit, however, that the external evidence preponderates, with ‘a manifest excess, on the side of the received reading.’ Paley. The same learned writer proceeds to argue, from internal evidence, that the epistle could hardly be written to a people, with whom the apostle had resided three years: (Notes, Acts 19:8—12. 20:29—31.) and it must be acknowledged, that in this respect it more resembles the epistle to the Romans, and that to the Colossians, than those epistles which the apostle wrote to the Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, and Thessalonians; in which there are constant allusions and appeals to what had past when he resided among them. As, however, the ‘external evidence preponderates, with a manifest excess, in favor of the received reading;’ and as Dr. Paley seems to be mistaken in supposing, that the word Ephesus was wanting in any manuscript extant,* it is in this exposition adhered to: though it may be observed, that the change of the word Ephesus, for Laodicea, or the total omission of it, would in no respect deduct from the abundant instruction, contained in the epistle itself.—‘It has been said, that if this epistle was directed to the Ephesians, it is difficult to understand how the apostle contented himself with giving them a general salutation, without mentioning any of his numerous friends and acquaintance, with whom he had been intimate during his long residence at Ephesus. But the answer is, ... there are no particular salutations, in the epistles to the Galatians, the Philippians, the Thessalonians, and to Titus, because to have sent particular salutations to individuals, in churches, where the apostle was so generally and intimately acquainted, ... might have offended those who were neglected. ... And to have mentioned every person of note in those churches, would have taken up too much room. In writing to the Romans, the case was different. The apostle was personally unknown to most of them: ... and therefore he could, ... without offence to the rest, take particular notice of all his acquaintance.’ Macknight. The successful ministry of the apostle in the renowned but licentious city of Ephesus, and his solemn charge to the elders of the church there founded, when they came to him at Miletus, have before been considered. (Notes, Acts 19: 20:17—35.) Some years after, he wrote this epistle, during his imprisonment at Rome, and probably near the close of it; (6:20.) to establish them in the great doctrines of the gospel, to guard them against errors, to excite them to a holy conversation, and to animate them in their Christian warfare.—This epistle, and the two that follow it, which were also written during his imprisonment, and probably about the same time, are remarkable for a peculiar pathos and ardor, or rapture as some have called it; and this is generally ascribed to the extraordinary consolations enjoyed by the apostle, during his sufferings for Christ’s sake. But his mind was doubtless enlarged to a remarkable degree in writing to those, whom he had no occasion to rebuke, and with whom he was not under the necessity of engaging in controversy: so that entire confidence of affection took place of the caution, reserve, or sharpness, which were requisite in the three preceding epistles.—Learned men, according to their different hypotheses, suppose, that the apostle continually refers, in this epistle, to the mysteries of Diana, to the Gnostics, or to the Judaizing teachers; but it may fairly be questioned, whether, writing with an inexpressible flow of holy affections, on the great subjects which rejoiced his heart; he had express reference to any of those things, of which expositors, more coldly speculating on his words, have imagined.—Perhaps, he had some general regard to the Judaizing corruptors of the gospel: but, as the epistle to the Colossians, which was written about the same time, and in other respects greatly resembles this, is far more explicit on that subject; it may be supposed that the Ephesians were less in danger from that quarter.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the Ephesians, 1,2. He blesses God for the spiritual blessings, which he had conferred on them and him, as "chosen in Christ," and "predestinated to the adoption of children," 3-5; as "accepted in the Beloved," "through the redemption of his blood," and "his grace abounding towards them, in all wisdom," 6-8; as gathered, and made heirs with his people, "to the praise of his glory, by first trusting in Christ," 9-12; and as "sealed by the Spirit of adoption the Earnest of their inheritance," 13,14. He thanks God for them, and prays that God would more completely illuminate them, and give them deeper experience of the grace and comforts of the gospel, 15-18; "according to the mighty power, by which Christ had been raised from the dead," and exalted as "Head over all things to his church," 19-23.

PAUL, <sup>a</sup> an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, <sup>b</sup> to the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the <sup>c</sup> faithful in Christ Jesus:

2 Grace <sup>d</sup> be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Note.—(Notes, Rom. 1:1-7, v. 7. 1 Cor. 1:1,2.) By "the faithful in Christ Jesus," the apostle might mean either believers in Christ, or such as approved themselves to be his "faithful" soldiers, servants, and stewards. (Marg. Ref. c.—Luke 12:42. 16:10-12. 1 Cor. 4:2. 1 Thes. 5:24. 2 Thes. 3:3. Heb. 3:2,5. 11:11. 1 John 1:9.) Faithful. (1) ἰλητός; John 20:27. Acts 10:45. 2 Cor. 6:15. 1 Tim. 4:3, 10,12. 5:16. 6:2.—Note, Col. 1:1,2.—Some have supposed, that the expression was intended to include other believers, as well as "the saints at Ephesus;" but it may be rendered, "even the faithful in Christ Jesus." (Marg. Ref. a, b, d.)—Grace. (2) 'This grace is given by the communication of the Holy Ghost, 'from the Father and the Son, to the church; '(John 14:23) which is the reason, that the 'Holy Ghost is not mentioned in these salutations.' Whitby.

6 To the 'praise of the glory of his grace, wherein <sup>u</sup> he hath made us accepted in <sup>x</sup> the Beloved:

7 In <sup>y</sup> whom we have redemption through his blood, <sup>z</sup> the forgiveness of sins, according <sup>a</sup> to the riches of his grace;

8 Wherein <sup>b</sup> he hath abounded toward us <sup>c</sup> in all wisdom and prudence;

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The twelve verses, from the third to the fourteenth inclusive, properly speaking, form one sentence. The apostle's mind was so full of his subject, that he was not very exact about his style; and this renders a double degree of attention requisite in those readers, who would fully enter into his meaning. We shall, however, better understand his argument and doctrine, by considering the passage in a more detached manner.—Reflecting on the great things, which God had done for him, and by him, especially among the Gentiles, the apostle broke out into the most rapturous praises and thanksgivings unto God on that account. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:1-7, v. 3.) He could do no other, than "bless the God and Father of the Lord Jesus," and celebrate the praises of his name, who had dealt so graciously with his believing people; and had conferred on them all spiritual blessings, which could be desired or enjoyed in respect of "heavenly things," and as the earnest of heavenly felicity; by giving his Son Jesus Christ for them, and by calling them to believe in him: or, by exalting Christ, as their Surety, Advocate, and Forerunner, into "the heavenly places," God had at once, as it were, conferred all spiritual blessings on every believer, as united unto him, and one with him. (Marg. Ref. e.—i.) This resulted from his choice of them, "in Christ," and "as given to him," (Note, John 6:36-40.) even "before the foundation of the world;" not because he foresaw they would, of themselves, be more holy than others of their fallen race; but that they "might be holy," by separation from sin, consecration unto God, and the sanctification of the Spirit, in consequence of their election in Christ. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:13,14. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.) Thus he purposed to render them "blameless before him in love;" not only in respect of their complete justification in Christ; but by their present integrity and sincerity in the professed love of Christ, of each other, and of all men; by their "blameless" walk "before God, in all his commandments and ordinances;” and at length by making them perfect in holy love and heavenly felicity. (Marg. Ref. k—n.) For he had “predestinated,” or fore-ordained them, to be adopted as his children by faith in Jesus Christ; and to be openly admitted to the privileges of that high relation to himself, notwithstanding their original and actual sinfulness. (Note, Rom. 8:28—31.) In doing this, according to his sovereign will and pleasure, he intended to exhibit the glory of his rich, free, and distinguishing grace, in the most illustrious manner; that they, and innumerable multitudes of redeemed men and holy angels, might celebrate the praises of it for ever: as by that glorious grace, he had made them (lost sinners, both of the Jews and Gentiles,) “accepted in his beloved” Son, being made the “righteousness of God in him:” so that, as the Father was well pleased in his beloved Son, he was also well pleased with them for his sake.—Or has “highly favored us in him;” (Luke 1:28.) seeing all other blessings flow without fail from justification in Christ. (Marg. Ref. p—x.)—For though in themselves they had been condemned criminals, enslaved, and imprisoned, under the curse of the law, and the power of sin and Satan, without any possibility of delivering themselves; (Note, Gal. 3:10—22.) yet Christ had paid a complete ransom for their souls, when he shed his blood on the cross: and, having been brought into a state of union with him, by regeneration and faith, they had obtained a complete redemption; their sins having been fully pardoned, and their souls set at liberty, from the fetters and dungeon of their former wretched condition. (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, Rom. 3:19—31. Tit. 2:14. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. Rev. 5:8—10.) This deliverance accorded to the unspeakable abundance of the free mercy and grace of God: his love appointed this method of redemption, provided the Redeemer, “spared not his own Son,” brought them to hear and embrace this salvation, freely pardoned all their sins, gave liberty to their captive souls, supplied all their wants, and invested them with the richest variety of privileges and blessings.—In exercising such astonishing grace, after so abundant a manner, the Lord had also acted “with all wisdom and prudent” counsel: for whereas mercy to criminals often gives encouragement to crimes, and disgraces or weakens the hands of government; his method of grace was so wisely ordered, that it showed sin in all its odiousness and desert of vengeance; exhibited the divine justice and holiness in the most tremendous glory, even in showing most abundant mercy; manifested all the attributes of God in glorious harmony; furnished the most effectual motives to the believer’s future obedience; and tended directly to subvert Satan’s empire of ungodliness and iniquity. So that the wisdom of God never shone so bright in the view of all holy intelligences, as in this display of the riches of his glorious grace. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—(Note, 3:9—12.)) Exalted and mysterious wisdom had also been displayed, in all the steps by which the way was prepared for the revelation of this plan, and in the time and manner in which it was revealed.—Blessed, &c. (3) When we bless God, we  speak well of him; when he blesses us, he powerfully confers blessings on us.—Chosen, &c. (4) ‘He speaks of whole societies in general, as consisting of saints, ... ‘because this was the prominent character. ... ‘Nor did he always judge it necessary to make ‘exceptions, in reference to a few hypocrites ‘who had crept in among them; any more than ‘Christ judged it so, to speak of Judas as excluded, when he mentions the twelve thrones on ‘which the apostles should sit. (Matt. 19:28.)— ‘In this view he says of them in general, that ‘they were chosen, . . . not to those present privileges, which they as all professed Christians ‘enjoy, but to real holiness and everlasting ‘glory.’ Doddridge.—Predestinated, &c. (5) ‘Predestination to the adoption of children,’ should be carefully distinguished from actual adoption; which is subsequent to regeneration and actual believing, and makes way for the Spirit of adoption. Note.—The blessings before-mentioned were communicated to believers, by the Lord's "making known to them the mystery of his will," respecting the method of redemption and salvation; and the admission of sinners into his family by faith in Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles. All these arrangements had been made "according to his good pleasure, which he had purposed in himself;" for, as he advised with no counsellor, so he gave no account of his holy, wise, and righteous appointments. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, Job 33:12,13. Rom. 11:33—36.) Having revealed these things to the apostles, and by them to the church; his divine teaching had led those whom "he had chosen," to see the glory of those truths, which others were left to blaspheme. Thus were they made to "know the mystery of his will;" and to understand, that "in the dispensation of the fulness of times," which at length had been introduced, the Lord purposed to "gather together," as into one kingdom or family, in his beloved Son and under his government, "all things in heaven and earth." So that not only Jews and Gentiles would become one church; not only were the saints, who had before gone to heaven, to be considered as one body under one head, with believers on earth; but even holy angels, and all the inhabitants of heaven, as confirmed in Christ, and his worshippers and subjects, would form one kingdom with redeemed sinners, and join with them in adoration, love, and obedience. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g, h.) By virtue of their relation to Christ and union with him, the apostle and the Jewish converts in the first instance had obtained this glorious "inheritance;" "having been predestinated, according to the purpose" of that glorious God, who carried on his work of creation, providence, and redemption, according to the wise counsels and that perfect plan, which he has seen good to form. (Marg. Ref. i—m.) And while most of their countrymen had been left under judicial blindness and unbelief, to be monuments of God's awful justice; they had been selected "for the praise of his glory," being brought "to trust in Christ" for salvation, by the power of divine grace, as the first-fruits of the Christian church; though in themselves deserving of wrath, no less than their unbelieving Jewish brethren.—Gather, &c. (10) 'As when orators form a brief recapitulation of their arguments, or the heads of their discourse; so believers are said to be collected together in Christ. ... For Christ is He, 'in whom all the elect, from the creation of the world, otherwise wandering from God, are gathered together; of whom were some in the heavens, when he came on earth; (who indeed had been gathered together, by faith in him who was to come;) others being found on earth, were gathered together, and are daily gathered to him.' Beza.—The union of angels with redeemed sinners, in one company of worshippers, seems also intended. (Notes, Heb. 12: 18—21. Rev. 5:8—14.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Not only the Jews, who had embraced the gospel; but the Gentile converts also, especially those at Ephesus, had, "to the praise of the glory" of God, been led to believe and hope in Christ; (Marg. Ref. p—s.—Notes, 2:11—13. Acts 19:8—12,23—31.) when "the word of truth," the glad tidings which proposed salvation to sinners, had been preached among them: for having believed that word, and so believed in Christ, they had been sealed by the Holy Spirit, who had been promised by the ancient prophets, and by Christ himself, before his ascension into heaven. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, Is. 44:3—5. 59:20,21. John 14: 15—17. Acts 1:4—8.) This cannot, with any propriety, be explained of miraculous powers. These were not the "earnest" pledge, and foretaste of heaven, as this "seal" is declared to have been: for many unsanctified persons exercised miraculous powers. But the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit seal believers, as the children of God and heirs of heaven; they are the first-fruits of that holy felicity, and they impress the holy image of God upon their souls. (Notes, 4:30—32. 2 Cor. 1: 21,22.)—Thus the Ephesian converts were preserved, supported, and comforted, and would be, during their time of trial and suffering in life and death; till they should at last be put in full possession of that complete redemption, which Christ had ensured to his "purchased people;" or till the inheritance, which sin had forfeited, but which Christ had "purchased" for them, should be, so to speak, fully rescued

Note.—The apostle had, for some time, witnessed the conduct of the Ephesians: but, having been absent from them at least six or seven years, he had again heard of "their faith in Christ, and love to all his saints;" which excited him without ceasing to thank God for his grace and mercy towards them, and animated him in mentioning them expressly by name, in all his secret and social prayers. (Marg. Ref. a-d.—Note, Col. 1:3-8.) Especially, he entreated the God whom the Lord Jesus Christ, as Man, had worshipped and obeyed, (Note, John 20:11-17, v. 17.) even "the Father of glory," the great Author of all that glory which is visible in the whole universe, that he would still more abundantly communicate to them the Holy Spirit, from whose influence all divine wisdom is derived to men; and who discovered to the hearts of believers the certainty, nature, and "glory" of those truths, which by prophets and apostles he had revealed to the church. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Note, John 16:14, 15.) That so, every veil of prejudice, pride, and sin being removed, they might more completely know God in Christ, and more confidently acknowledge their relation to him. (Notes, Luke 24:44-49. Acts 16:13-15. 26:16-18. 2 Cor. 3:12-18. 4:3-6.) That, "the eyes of their minds being illuminated," they might understand more clearly, and experience more deeply, the value of that grand Object of "hope," to which God had called them by his gospel; and perceive what riches of grace, consolation, and spiritual blessings were comprised in that "glory," which constituted "the inheritance conferred on his saints;" or the rich abundance and revenue of glory, which the Lord would derive from his saints, as "his chosen inheritance." (Marg. Ref. h-o.—Note, Deut. 32:9.) And, that they might perceive what "exceeding greatness of his power" had been exerted in their conversion to the faith; and was still engaged to uphold, strengthen, and defend them, to perfect their new creation, and to complete their redemption from Satan, sin, and death; according to the display of the same mighty power, which was put forth in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ. bie that the apostle seems here studiously to have exhausted the utmost vigor of the Greek language to express, by a beautiful accumulation of energetic words, the omnipotence of God, as effecting the believer's conversion and salvation, continuing, as it were, that exertion of it, by which the Redeemer was raised from the dead. (Notes, 2:4—10. 3:20, 21. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—Our Version well renders the passage: yet the emphasis of the original is not preserved, nor perhaps can be in a translation.—In consequence of the resurrection of Christ, he had been exalted, in human nature, to the right hand of the Father, on the mediatorial throne “in heavenly places,” far above all creatures, however dignified; not only above the princes of the earth; not only as the conqueror and destroyer of the powers of darkness; but even far above the hierarchies of heaven, however distinguished as “principalities, or powers, &c.” yea, above every name that ever was or will be celebrated, on earth or in heaven; either during the continuance of “this world, or that which is to come.” (Marg. Ref. s—z.—Notes, Matt. 28:18. John 5:20—29. Phil. 2:9—11. Col. 1:15—20. 1 Pet. 3:21, 22. Rev. 1:12—20.) And as all creatures were subjected to his government, so all enemies were virtually put under his feet: seeing he has power and authority to crush them as he pleases; and will continue to do this, in the proper seasons, till the last enemy shall be destroyed. (Marg. Ref. a.—Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) Having thus exalted the risen Saviour, the Father has constituted him absolute and universal Governor of the world, and given him to be “the Head of the church,” that he might employ his unbounded authority and almighty power for its benefit: so that the whole is exercised in subserviency to his purposes of grace, and to render effectual his redemption, in the final salvation of his chosen and redeemed people. For the church is his body; he is the Head of life and authority to the whole company of believers, as united to him; and they are dear to him, and are taken care of by him, as the members of his body: so that he, “in whom all fulness dwells,” is not complete in his mediatorial character, except in the preservation and full salvation of his whole mystical body. And, while he fills heaven and earth with his glory, he fills his ordinances with his power and gracious presence; and dwells in every believer, by his Spirit of life, purity, and love: he condescends to deem them essential to his own fulness of glory; even as every member of the body is to the completeness of the human nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Faith in Christ, and faithfulness to him, unite in forming the character of his saints: and to the sovereign grace of God we wholly owe it, if we are either true believers, or approved ministers. “God our Father,” from whom, “and the Lord Jesus,” through whom, grace and peace are given to sinful men, ought to be adored and praised for all those spiritual blessings, with which we are or hope to be blessed, in time and to eternity. The appointment of the eternal Son of the Father, as the Surety for fallen man, in the divine foreknowledge, is the source of all the hopes and comforts of those who “were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy, and without blame before him in love.” For personal holiness was provided for, in every part of the counsel of God, respecting man's salvation. So that the renewal of our hearts to the divine image, and a blameless walk before God, from love to him and to our brethren, are the proper evidences that we “were predestinated” and have been called by God, to “the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will.” For when this purpose of God took effect, by our being “made accepted in his beloved Son, in whom we have redemption through faith in his blood, even the forgiveness of our sins, according to the riches of his grace;” then, as the children of God, who is Love, we began to bear his image and became followers of him. (Notes, 5:1, 2. 1 John 4:7, 8.) Thus the change wrought, as well as the mercy shown, are “to the praise of the glory of his grace;” the reconciled rebel, the adopted son, gives all the praise of his salvation to his gracious Father; his actions, as well as his lips, declare the praises of the divine mercy; and it appears evident, that most adorable “wisdom and prudence” were conjoined with unspeakable grace, in forming and executing the holy plan of man's salvation.

V. 9—14.

The mysteries of God, in man's redemption, must have been for ever hidden from us, if he had not made them known to us by his gospel, and his Spirit of truth. Thus, in every respect, he dispenses his blessings according to “the good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself.” If, in accomplishing his grand design of “gathering together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and in earth,” he has brought us to seek and obtain an inheritance among his redeemed people; we shall not length, and ought now, thankfully to acknowledge, that we were “predestinated according to the purpose of him, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.” He sent

"the word of truth, the gospel of salvation" to us, while others were left in darkness and without even 'the means of grace;' he "quickeneth us," when others were left "dead in sin;" he enabled us to trust in Christ, as well as sealed our pardon by his sanctifying Spirit, as the earnest of our future glorious inheritance.—We need not wonder that self-wise and self-sufficient men deride and dispute against these humbling and spiritual mysteries: nor is it at all desirable, that they should embrace them as a scheme of doctrine, in a proud, carnal mind. But, that humble believers, who allow their own hearts to be as evil (except as renewed by divine grace,) as those of their most irreligious neighbors, should be afraid of tracing back their present experience of that grace, to the sovereign purpose and electing love of God in Christ; that in giving him the whole glory of having "made them to differ," they may also possess a ground of assurance of his perfecting his good work in their souls: this, I say, is matter of surprise to those, who find the sweetest animation and encouragement from the glorious review and prospect; and in every past and present mercy possess a pledge and earnest of future and eternal felicity.

V. 15—23.

If any, who appear to have "faith in the Lord Jesus, and love to all the saints," are dazzled by the sublime mysteries above stated: their more established brethren should not forget, "who has made them to differ" in this respect also; and, instead of forming rash judgments, and engaging in angry disputations, (which are peculiarly unsuitable on this subject,) they should thank God, for what he has done for them, and pray always for those whom they deem mistaken. (Note, Rom. 14:1—6.) Indeed, we all need to pray for ourselves and each other, "to the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory," (Note, Matt. 6:13.) for a larger communication of "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, in the knowledge of him." We shall do far more, in this way, towards bringing believers to "be of one mind and judgment," than by eager and acrimonious controversies, however ably conducted: "for a man can receive nothing, except it be given him from above;" and high confidence, on one side of the question, commonly excites the same on the other side, with all its hateful consequences. But, if we disputed with less earnestness, and prayed with greater fervency for each other, "the eyes of our understandings being enlightened," we should daily see more and more "what is the hope of our calling, and the riches of God's glory, in the inheritance of his saints."—When most sensible of our own weakness and the power of our enemies, we shall most perceive and experience "the greatness of that mighty power," which has effected our conversion, and is engaged to perfect our salvation. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) For the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, his universal and sovereign authority and almighty power, were all intended for our benefit, if we be indeed the members of his mystical body the church; which is "the fulness of him who filleth all in all." The immensity of this love and condescension, and of our privileges, should excite our enlarged expectations; our unspeakable obligations, if duly apprehended, will constrain us by love to live to our Redeemer's glory; and thus our humble, holy, and cheerful lives will vindicate our doctrine from the calumnies of those who "speak evil of such things as they understand not." (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 1 Pet. 2:9—12.)

CHAP. II.

The apostle shows the Christians at Ephesus their former ruined state, as dead in sin, slaves of Satan and "children of disobedience;" among whom he and all believers once were, being "by nature the children of wrath, even as others." 1—3. All who do not perish are saved "by grace," "in Christ," "through faith;" and "created unto good works," 4—10. The Gentiles were once "without Christ, without hope, without God;" but by the special grace of God, through the atonement of Christ, all who believed were brought nigh, and reconciled to God; had access to him; and were formed into one church with Jewish converts, the ritual law being taken away by the death of Christ, 11—18. Thus they became one family and temple; a habitation of God through the Spirit, 19—22.

Note.—The almighty power of God, which "raised Christ from the dead," (1:20.) had also raised to spiritual life the Ephesians, who had been "dead in sin." For the words, "hath he quickened," seem to have been properly, from the fifth verse, supplied by our translators: as, in the original, that verse appears to take up and conclude the sentence here begun, merely by changing you into us, entirely in the apostle's manner. To be "dead in trespasses and sins" implies an utter incapacity for spiritual employments and satisfactions; the want of all desire after that felicity, which holy creatures enjoy in the favor and service of God; and a moral inability of worshipping and obeying him with love and delight: even as a dead man is utterly incapable of the business and enjoyments of life. The employments and pleasures of animal nature, and even those of a rational being, are within the capacities of a man who is "dead in sin;" but he cannot relish or desire spiritual pleasures. He may be an epicure, or a philosopher; but he cannot find satisfaction in the peculiar employments of a saint. For while "dead in sin," he must be "carnal;" and "the carnal mind is enmity against God," and opposition to the holy law. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, John 3:3. Rom. 5:12—14. 8:5—9.) Such a man therefore must be an apostate and an idolater, who seeks happiness in the creature, not in the Creator: and he lives only to disobey, to pursue worldly things, to corrupt himself and others, and to aggravate his condemnation as a transgressor of the divine law. Thus "the saints and faithful brethren at Ephe-

“dead in trespasses and sins,” and had habitually walked in them, and had lived under an accumulating load of guilt, and the power of their evil propensities, without concern about the consequences. Thus they had proceeded according to the customs, fashions, and maxims “of this present evil world.” They had acted in the same manner as their neighbors, and as other men did all over the earth. Indeed this was “according to the course of this world,” and according to the will of the devil: a dreadful advance on the preceding clause, though evidently contained in it. They had copied the example and yielded to the temptations of Satan, “the god” and “prince of this world,” that arch-apostate and rebel, who has the seat of his empire in the air, and there exerts his power and influence. (Marg. Ref. c —f.—Note, 2 Cor. 4:3,4.) This last circumstance at least accorded to the notions then prevalent among the Jews, and even among the Gentiles, concerning their genii and demons; which, whether to be understood literally or figuratively, was sufficient for the apostle’s purpose. There, “in the air,” Satan and the legions of fallen angels which are subordinate to him continually wait their opportunity of tempting men to sin; by keeping from their minds good thoughts, and serious impressions, or quenching them, and exciting the enmity of their hearts against them, and by suggesting others of a contrary tendency. In this way, the devil maintains his dominion; and men in general copy his example of rebellion, enmity, and contemptuous defiance of God; of pride, ambition, envy, malice, deceit, and destruction; or they gratify his malignity, by destroying themselves and each other, through gross sensualities, or by horrid war, and murder committed in various ways, and under many plausible pretences; or his ambition, by idolatry, impiety, and infidelity. Thus the believers at Ephesus had walked, “according to that spirit which still worked in the children of disobedience,” that is, in those who persisted in unbelief and rebellion against God. Or, as it may be more literally rendered, “according to the prince of the power of the air, of that spirit which now worketh in the children of disobedience.” Satan is the author and ruler of that proud, carnal, and impious disposition, which is in ungodly men: his temptations first produced it in human nature; and he works on it by the agency of evil spirits, to instigate it to all wickedness in thought, word, and deed. Thus he rules in man’s heart; he possesses, as it were, all unbelievers; and he prompts, and as it were inspires with wit and ingenuity, the advocates for vice, impiety, and infidelity, by whom he maintains his empire in the world. Note.—The apostle before spoke of the Gentile converts exclusively, or at least principally: but here (in the same manner, as in the epistle to the Romans, he proved the Jews also to be under sin,) he turns his discourse, and includes both himself, and all the converts from his nation, among those who once were “dead in sin” and slaves to Satan: and he proceeds to use the first person plural to the end of the seventh verse, and then he again addresses the Gentile converts.—‘He could not mean the Jews,’ say many learned men, ‘because they had not been idolaters.’ But had the apostle at all mentioned idolatry? and is there no way of conforming to the world and serving the devil, except by gross idolatry? To suppose that the apostle spake of himself, as one of the Gentiles, or one of the church of Rome, where he then was, as chiefly consisting of Gentile converts, is so absurd in itself, so unsuitable to his argument, so needless after what he had said of the Gentiles, and so contrary to his language and that of the most eminent saints in other parts of scripture, that nothing, it may fairly be presumed, could have reconciled learned writers to it, but the necessity of adopting it, in order to avoid the doctrine of “original sin,” in the full and proper meaning of the terms, as true of all men, Jew, Gentile, or Christian, as “naturally engendered of Adam’s race;” and so to avoid also the doctrine of ‘regeneration;’ or a real new creation of the soul, by the power of the Holy Spirit.—The author of these notes was once deeply engaged in this scheme, being strongly attached to Mr. Locke’s views; but this very text shook his whole system to the foundation. Much above forty years have elapsed since that time: and he has had abundant time, and has bestowed no little pains, in reconsidering the subject; but is more and more deeply convinced, that the interpretation is wholly unscriptural; and that it tends to evaporate the meaning of the sacred oracles, as if we had little concern in the greatest part of them.—Not only were the idolatrous Ephesians thus “dead in sin,” and under the power of Satan; but the apostle, and all other Christians then on earth, had “in times past their conversation among them,” as alienated from God, and disobedient to him. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) They lived “in the lusts of their flesh;” or according to the desires of their carnal hearts; gratifying their animal appetites in sensual wickedness; or the proud, ambitious, covetous, and malignant tempers of their minds, as constitution, custom, or education swayed them; without any proper regard to the authority, will, glory, or favor of God. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, John 3:6. Rom. 7:5,6. 8:5—9. Gal. 5:16—21.) So that the Jews as well as the Gentiles, and the Christians as well as those who remained unconverted, were “by nature” “dead in sin,” “and children of wrath,” one as well as another. For, being born of Adam’s fallen race, averse to good and prone to evil, they were alike in the temper of their hearts, and the conduct of their lives, deserving of the wrath of God, and meet objects of it. (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Note, Rom. 1:22,23.)—Great pains, as it has been observed, have been employed to prove, that “nature” may signify custom, or habitual practice. But the attempt has been evidently baffled in the critical argument. At the same time, stubborn facts prove, that men called Christians are “dead in sin,” as much as the Gentiles were; and that the children of believers are as prone to evil, and averse to good, as those of idolaters. And surely no one can suppose, that “worldly lusts” are more excusable in Christians, than in heathens!—The word rendered “by nature,” seems never to have been used for any other customs, than such as resulted from innate propensities: and the whole tenor of the scripture, as well as the experience and confessions of the most pious persons who ever lived, confirm the interpretation, and expressly contradict that more flattering one, which some have attempted to substitute in its place.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Even when the apostle and his fellow-Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, “were dead in sin,” incapable of helping themselves, and meet objects of wrath and abhorrence in the sight of God, he “loved them” with an exceedingly great love; not for any thing which he saw or foresaw in them, but because he was “rich in mercy,” and delighted in the most abundant and illustrious exercise of it. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, 1:3—8. John 3:16. Rom. 5:6—10. Tit. 3:3—7. 1 John 4:9—12,19.) Having therefore loved them, and given his own Son to die for their sins, and raised him as their Surety from the dead; the same immensely free mercy influenced him ‘to raise them from the death of sin,’ by a continued exercise of that almighty power, which had raised the Saviour. Thus he “quickened them,” or made them alive, “together with Christ,” in virtue of his resurrection, with life communicated from him by the Holy Spirit. (Note, 1:15—23.) So that they were saved, or “had been saved,” wholly by unmerited grace; whether their election, redemption, or conversion were considered. Being thus raised to a new life, in conformity to their risen Lord, they in him, their Head, Representative, and Surety, were “made to sit in heavenly places;” their future glory was ensured by his ascension and exaltation, and by their union with him; and their treasures, hearts, and hopes were already in heaven with “Christ their life.” (*Marg. and Marg. ridge. (Note, John 14:18—20.) This whole plan had been formed and executed, that “in the ages to come,” in future generations, and future worlds, the Lord might display “the exceeding riches of his grace,” by the astonishing kindness shown to rebels and enemies, and “children of wrath” in Christ Jesus; that so, men and angels, and all created intelligences, to eternity, might behold, admire, and adore his glorious mercy and love in these transactions. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) The apostle would therefore repeat and enlarge upon the hint before given; that “they had been saved by grace;” they were brought into a state of salvation, by the mere mercy of God, through faith in Christ: and even this faith, which effected their relation to him, was not of themselves; their proud and carnal minds having been utterly averse to the humbling and spiritual doctrine: but it was the free gift of God to them, the effect of their being quickened or regenerated by his Spirit. Thus their pride and enmity, their love of sin and the world, were subdued; and they were brought to believe the gospel, and to trust in Christ. This salvation therefore was in no degree or way “of works, lest any man” should have a ground of boasting, that he did, of himself, contribute in some degree to his own happiness, or of glorying over his neighbor. (Marg. Ref. c—f.—Notes, Rom. 3:19—28. 1 Cor. 1:26—31.) For, though believers differed greatly from other men, and from their former selves; this was the effect of a divine power exerted upon them: they were “the workmanship of God,” who in Christ had wrought a new creation upon their souls; giving new principles, or propensities, to their several faculties, and a new direction to their affections and desires. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, 2 Cor. 5:17.) Thus their disposition and ability to love God, and to do good works, should be considered as a part of their salvation, not as the cause of it: for it was the purpose of God, that his redeemed people should habitually walk in good works, from their conversion, till they finished their course; and their holy lives were the effect, evidence, and recommendation of their salvation by grace.—“Both faith and works are God’s ‘workmanship; both are necessary; but the ‘one the fruit of the other.’ Maclaurin.—That not. (8) If this be understood of the whole of salvation, faith must be included. (Note, John 1:10—13.)—The term “good works,” is never used, in the New Testament, for ritual obedience, or moral virtue as practised by unbelievers, or for any other works than “the fruits of the Spirit.” If any one doubt of this, let him consult a good concordance. The only text, which seems an exception, is Rom. 13:3. and that means ‘works good before God,’ primarily, though perhaps not exclusively. Without doubt, regeneration and sanctification by the Spirit of Christ, are as much a part of our salvation, as redemption and justification.

Note.—Having spoken of the general state of fallen man, and the salvation of all believers, by the rich grace and mercy of God; the apostle next proceeded to show the Gentile converts the peculiarities of their case, which had placed them much further out of the way of mercy than the Jews had been. He would have them “remember,” that they had been not only “dead in sin,” but “Gentiles in the flesh,” as to their outward state, their gross idolatries, immoralities, and sensuality; so that they had been called “the Uncircumcision,” in contempt and aversion, as polluted and out of covenant with God; even by those Jews, who had only the outward circumcision in the flesh, of man’s operation, without the “circumcision of the heart.” (Marg. rate from "Christ:" being "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel," and its peculiar advantages as the visible church of God, in which his ordinances were administered, his oracles deposited, and the expectation of a Messiah given and maintained. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) They had also been "strangers from the covenants of promise;" the Abrahamic covenant, that made with Israel at Sinai, the covenant of royalty, and that of the priesthood; in all which the Messiah was the great blessing promised. (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Rom. 3:1,2. 9:4,5.) So that, whatever notions they might have of a future state, they had nothing on which to ground "a hope" of acceptance and happiness in it: all their expectations of that kind were mere presumption; and, whatever demons, idols, or imaginary beings they worshipped, they were indeed "atheists in the world," as to the only true God, and as to the effect of their fables or speculations upon their conduct; which was nearly as bad, as it would have been, if they all had been avowed atheists: seeing that their abominable idolatry led them perhaps into more immorality, than it restrained them from; besides the impiety inherent in it. (Marg. Ref. t, u.) But at length those who had been by nature, practice, custom, and external situation, so very far off, from the worship, service, love, favor, and image of God, were "brought nigh" to him, as in Christ Jesus by faith: thus they were admitted into a state of acceptance, reconciliation, and friendship with God, through the atoning blood of Christ; and were become his peculiar people and spiritual worshippers. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—How rude and affronting would a company of unhumiliated impenitent sinners, especially in a superior station of life, consider it, should a friend in a letter, or a minister in a sermon, at present address them in this language! The marked distinction also, of the case of the Gentiles from that before described, confirms the interpretation given of the third verse.—Remember, &c. (11) *Notes, Deut. 8:2. Ps. 103:1,2. 14 For he is <sup>a</sup> our Peace, who hath made <sup>b</sup> both one, and hath broken down <sup>c</sup> the middle wall of partition between us;

15 Having abolished <sup>d</sup> in his flesh the enmity, even <sup>e</sup> the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain <sup>f</sup> one new man, so making peace;

Note.—In every sense, Christ was to be considered as "the Peace" of all Christians; the Author, Centre, and Substance of reconciliation to God, and of the union of Gentile converts with Jewish believers in one church. For he had effected a cordial peace between those discordant parties, (who had before exceedingly despised and even detested each other,) by "breaking down that partition-wall," which had so long separated the Jews from the Gentiles; namely, the ceremonial law, to which the Gentiles were extremely averse, even when otherwise favorable to the worship of JEHOVAH; and of which the Jews were tenacious and proud, to a degree of disgusting bigotry. But Christ, by assuming human nature, and fulfilling, in his priestly character, especially by his sacrifice on the cross, these typical institutions, had abolished them; and thus removed the ground of enmity of the Jews and Gentiles against each other, concerning them. So that this law, (the commands of which consisted of external ordinances,) having lost all its use and obligation; the Gentiles were admitted into the Christian church, without submitting to the yoke of the ceremonial law, or being deemed unclean because uncircumcised. (Marg. Ref. a—e.—Notes, Acts 10:9—16,27—33.) Thus they became "one body" with the believing Jews, that so Christ might create, as it were, "One new man," consisting of regenerate persons, both Jews and Gentiles, united to himself the Head, quickened by his Spirit, "walking in newness of life," harmonious in worship and obedience, and mutually loving and doing good to one another. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, 4:11—13. Is. 11:6—9. Rom. 12:3—5. 1 Cor. 12:12—31. Gal. 3:26—29.) In this way, Christ was the Peace-maker between Jews and Gentiles; and at the same time, he "reconciled both, in one body, unto God." For the ceremonial law implied man's state of condemnation, pollution, and enmity against God; to whom he could not approach, except on an external mercy-seat, and by priests, sacrifices, incense, and purifications; being, after all, kept at a great distance from him: but the death of Christ upon the cross took away the guilt, which was the cause of "the enmity;" that so a holy God might honorably pardon and be reconciled to his rebellious creatures. And it made way for the communication of the Holy Spirit to regenerate sinners, and so to destroy "the enmity" of their hearts against the holy character, worship, and service of God. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Having finished this great design, he came, by his apostles and ministers, to preach the gospel, or glad tidings, even peace, with God and with each other, to the Gentiles who "had been far off," and to the Jews who were outwardly "nigh" to God. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, Is. 57:19. Acts 10:36—43. 2 Cor. 5:17—21. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) For through the Person, sacrifice, and mediation of Christ, believers of all descriptions were allowed access to God, as a Father; and were introduced with acceptance into his presence, with their worship and services, under the immediate teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, as one with the Father and the Son, in this great work of salvation, as well as in the unity of the Godhead. (Marg. Ref. l—n.) It should be noticed, that, in the seventeenth verse, the apostle, distinguishing the Gentile converts from the Jewish, says, "you that were far off;" thus evidently ranging himself among the Jewish converts, who were comparatively nigh. This is natural, and perfectly destructive of that unnatural interpretation, by which he is supposed to include himself among the Gentile converts. (Note, 3.)—The wall, which separated the uncircumcised Gentiles, who came to worship the God of Israel at the temple, from the Jews and the circumcised proselytes, is generally supposed to be alluded to, by the "middle wall of partition." For, under the Christian dispensation, the Jewish and Gentile converts all worship together, as one body, animated by one soul, and speaking by one tongue. (Notes, Col. 2:10—23.)

19 Now therefore ye are no more ° strangers and foreigners, P but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of 9 the household of God;

20 And are 7 built upon 8 the foundation of the apostles and prophets, 1 Jesus Christ himself being the chief Corner-stone;

21 In whom 2 all the building, x fitly framed together, groweth unto 3 an holy temple in the Lord:

22 In whom ye also are builded together, for 2 an habitation of God through the Spirit.

Note.—The Gentile believers were no longer "strangers and aliens," excluded from the privileges of God's people, as foreigners are from those of native subjects: or as those, who from other nations came occasionally to worship at Jerusalem, were from the stated or resident worshippers, whether Jews or proselytes. But they were become "fellow-citizens" of the heavenly Jerusalem, with the most eminent "saints" of Israel: they belonged to "the household of God," not only as servants but as children. (Marg. Ref. o—q.) Nay, they were made a part of the spiritual temple, which the outward sanctuary had typified; having been "built upon the foundation," which prophets of old, and apostles of late, had laid in their doctrine and in their writings; of which foundation, and of the whole superstructure, Jesus Christ himself was "the chief Corner-stone," the Centre of union, the Cement, and Support. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, Matt. 16:18. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) Upon him "the whole building, being fitly framed," according to the counsel and plan of the divine Architect, "grew up to a holy temple in the Lord;" being dedicated to his glory, the place of his special presence and power, in which he delighted to be worshipped. (Marg. Ref. u—y.)—Thus, by the continual conversion of sinners, and the progressive sanctification of believers; while each individual in his proper place, conduces to the stability and proportion of the whole, and is himself consecrated and preserved by being a part of it; the spiritual temple is erecting from age to age, and will be till its full completion in heaven. So that, the Gentiles, being in Christ by faith, were "built on this foundation" laid by prophets and apostles, whose predic-

Thus they became a part of the temple, together with Jewish believers; for the special in-dwelling of God, who by his Holy Spirit reigned in them, communicated his peculiar blessings to them, and was glorified by them. ### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We cannot duly value the gospel, unless convinced that we are in ourselves "dead in trespasses and sins;" and that we must have perished, if God had left us, as he most justly might have done. Yet, when we had neither title to happiness, nor capacity for it; when we were unable to help ourselves, and unwilling to attempt it; when we were utterly insensible of our danger, ready to vindicate our conduct, and perhaps proud of our wisdom, strength, and goodness, the love and mercy of God were extended to us! This indeed is still the case with the immense multitudes, "who walk according to the course of this world," in the broad way of destruction: (Note, Matt. 7:13, 14.) for those who go with the stream, who conform to this world, and "live in pleasure, are dead while they live." They seek liberty in the bondage of Satan: and that "prince of the power of the air" illudes his numerous votaries, with gay phantoms of fancied good; and enables them to build magnificent palaces in his unsubstantial element: that they may neglect "the gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Thus millions copy his example of rebellion, and do as he would have them. He still "works in the hearts of the children of disobedience;" he prompts "his ministers of unrighteousness," and infidelity: (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) and, while he emboldens them to deride the doctrine of scripture, concerning divine influences, and the agency of good and evil spirits; he must feel a horrid pleasure, mingled with contempt of the folly of those, who are thus deluded by his deceptions. There is no doubt a black inspiration; and Satan and his angels working on pride, enmity, and love of sin, in the hearts of ungodly men, teach them to invent, propagate, and ingeniously defend, impious or infidel notions, and to excuse or palliate their ungodliness and worldly lusts.—But indeed, in one way or another, "we have all had our conversation among" these "children of disobedience," under Satan's influence, and fulfilling the desires of our carnal minds: and, on the broad ground of scripture, we may assert with confidence, that, whether men have been more prone to sensual or to spiritual wickedness, all are alike "by nature the children of wrath;" that those who oppose this humbling tenet are yet "dead in sin;" and that the state of those, who know little or nothing of this in their own experience, is very doubtful.

V. 4—10.

In proportion as we judge of ourselves as justly condemned sinners, so will be our apprehensions of Christ and his salvation: the more fully we perceive our guilt and pollution, the greater will be our astonishment and adoring gratitude, in contemplating the immensity of the love and the rich mercy of our God: and we shall not only allow the gift of Christ, of pardon, and of eternal life, to be most free, and contrary to our deservings; but we shall ascribe the change, which we have experienced in conversion, to the abundant "love of God to us, even when we were dead in sin." By his power we were quickened together with "Christ:" (Note, Rom. 8:1,2.) he taught us to aspire to an inheritance in the heavenly places, with our risen and ascended Redeemer; and the same considerations, which will excite the admiration, and be the delightful theme, of all holy creatures throughout a blessed eternity, now lead us to adore "the exceeding riches of the grace of God, in his kindness to us" hitherto. When we reflect on the infinite majesty of God, the immensity of the creation, the meanness and wickedness and deep depravity of man, and the stupendous plan of redemption; we shall not be able to account for such favor shown to us, except we also consider, that "the exceeding riches of divine grace," will be proportionably displayed and glorified, in the view of the whole creation, on account of each of these circumstances, and of very many others, to eternal ages. "We are then saved by grace, through faith; and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God:" for if it had been at all of works, or man could in any respect have boasted, the glory of God had not been complete. Yet let none infer, that this is an unholy salvation, for all who partake of it are "God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works;" and his purpose and efficacious operation concur in securing the willing and active obedience and holiness of all true believers. So that none can, on the ground of scripture, either pervert the doctrine to licentiousness, or accuse it of that tendency; and all who attempt either of these things will be "left without excuse."

V. 11—22.

Besides the general ruined state of all men, every one of us should recollect those peculiarities of situation, character, and disposition, which set us at a greater distance from salvation, than others of our fellow-sinners. The immoral and licentious conduct of some; the impiety, infidelity, or dangerous heresies of others; the pharisaical pride of many; an utter disregard to religion, and ignorance of even its forms and first principles, with various other circumstances, had rendered the case of some persons peculiarly perilous; and should increase their humility and gratitude, if at length they have been converted. Many of us were once without the external knowledge of Christ, at a distance from the professors of his gospel, "strangers to the covenants of promise;" having no thought or concern about future happiness, or hope of it, and living as atheists in the world. These things should be brought into the account, in order to increase our love and zealous obedience; if we, who once were so very "far off, are brought nigh by the blood of Christ." Through this great Peace-maker, how near may the chief of sinners approach to a reconciled God! (Note, Ps. 73:23—28.) How harmoniously then should believers live together, as members of one body, and children of one family! May his grace reconcile all, who profess his truth, to God and to each other! May every "partition-wall" be pulled down, and every enmity slain, which prevents the complete union of Christians, as "one new Man in Christ!" May he go with his ministers to the ends of the earth, "preaching the glad tidings of peace to those that are afar off!" May his gospel be more fully and faithfully and successfully dispensed among "those that are nigh!" May sinners every where seek and find "access to the Father," through the Son, and by the Holy Spirit! If we are experimentally acquainted with this way of access to our reconciled God; we are "no more strangers and foreigners, whatever once we were; but fellow citizens of the saints and of the household of God." We have no "law of commandments contained in ordinances," to keep us in bondage, to drive us to a distance, or to excite enmity among brethren; except such as are of human invention. The instituted ordinances of worship, appointed by our Saviour, as well as his moral precepts, are suited to aid and encourage our approach to God, and our walk with him; to excite our holy affections, and to conduce to our peace with one another, when properly understood and attended on. Sinners, in these far distant regions, now hear Christ "preaching peace" to them, and are invited to seek access to God through him; believers "are built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ being the chief Corner-stone;" that they may be "an habitation of God through the Spirit." Let us then inquire, whether we are "built on this foundation;" whether our hopes are fixed on Christ, according to the doctrine of his word; whether we have devoted ourselves as "a holy temple" to God through him; whether we be "an habitation of God by the Spirit;" whether we be spiritually minded, and bring forth "the fruits of the Spirit." If this is our experience and privilege; let us take care not to defile the temple of God, nor to grieve our holy Comforter: let us earnestly, and with fervent constant prayer, desire his gracious presence with us, and his influence on our hearts: let us endeavor to fill up the place assigned us, to the glory of God: and let us study to promote the peace and purity of the holy temple, to which we belong, and to forward that work by which it is continually approaching towards its full perfection. Especially, let us seek, and pray, and improve to the uttermost our influence, be it more or less, for the conversion of the Gentiles, who are still "without Christ, without hope, and without God in the world," and for the restoration of the poor scattered Jews, and of all Israel, to those privileges and blessings, from which they have been so long excluded through unbelief; "that they, through our mercy, may obtain mercy:" and that Jew and Gentile, all over the world, may unite in adoring and serving the God of Salvation, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

CHAP. III.

Paul, the prisoner of Christ for the Gentiles, <sup>1</sup> shows, that the mystery concerning their salvation, which was before concealed, had been made known to him by revelation 2—7; and to him, <sup>2</sup> who was less than the least of all saints, was this grace given, that he should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, <sup>3</sup> 8; that "the principalities and powers in heavenly places" might, in the church, discover "the manifold wisdom of God;" while, "according to his eternal purpose," Jews and Gentiles had "access with boldness, by Jesus Christ," 10—12. He desires that the Ephesians may not faint, because of his tribulations for them, 13; fervently prays, that they may be abundantly strengthened, enlightened, sanctified, and comforted, 14—20; and concludes with most animated praises, 21.

"For this cause, I Paul, am the prisoner of Jesus Christ." The apostle's zealous preaching to the Gentiles, and openly admitting them into the Christian church, without circumcision, or observance of the ritual law, which implied the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, had so irritated the Jews, that they had apprehended him at Jerusalem; in consequence of which he was at this time a prisoner at Rome, in the cause of Christ, and for the sake of the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. a-c.—Notes, Acts 21:27—30. 22:22—30. Gal. 5:7—12. 6:11—14. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.) As he was therefore "the prisoner of Christ for them," they ought to read his epistle with peculiar attention; since they had heard of the manner in which he had been converted, and intrusted with "a dispensation" to "preach the gospel of the grace of God," as the apostle of the Gentiles; and how Christ, by immediate revelation, had made known to him "the mystery" of his love: as he had briefly written to them in the preceding chapters; on an attentive perusal of which, they would readily perceive his extensive "knowledge in the mystery of Christ." (Marg. Ref. d-k.—Notes, 1:3—14. 2:1—10.) This had not in former ages been made known to mankind, with that clearness, with which it was at length "revealed to the holy apostles and prophets" of Christ by the Holy Spirit: especially it had not been understood, that the Gentiles, without being proselyted to the Mosaic law, should be admitted to be "fellow-heirs" with the Jews of their covenanted blessings; forming with them one mystical body, on embracing the gospel. (Marg. Ref. l-q.—Note, 2:11—22.) Of this new "dispensation" Paul had been "made a minister;" having received the gratuitous pardon of his sins, and abundant mercy and favor from God; and having been effectually changed by the powerful operation of his Spirit, and qualified for that important service. (Marg. Ref. r-t.—Notes, 1:15—23. Gal. 2:6—10. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.)—Those who had stately attended on the ministry of the apostle, during his residence at Ephesus, must often have heard from him concerning "the dispensation of the grace of God which was given to him" in behalf of the Gentiles (2); but numbers out of the adjacent regions, coming to Ephesus, heard the gospel from him; many of whom, it is highly probable, returning home, both professed and preached it: and these might need more full information on this subject, which was so peculiarly interesting to the Gentiles.—St. Peter was sent to Cornelius, the first Gentile convert: but it does not appear, that the whole design of God, respecting the union of uncircumcised and idolatrous Gentiles, when converted to Christianity, in one church with Jewish believers, was so clearly revealed to him, as it was soon after to St. Paul. At least the latter, with his coadjutors, proclaimed this doctrine, so encouraging to the Gentiles and offensive to the Jews, far more avowedly, and to immensely greater numbers, than any other of the apostles, of whom we read in scripture.—Some indeed imagine, that the apostle meant to show, that the value of the Christian revelation was vastly greater, than that of the curious books which the Ephesians had burned, (Acts 19:19.) and than the mysteries of the initiated in the worship of Diana. But if the former were indeed "the oracles" of Satan, and the latter probably no better; we can hardly conceive that the apostle would disgrace "the oracles of God," by such a comparison. The same may fairly be said of several other comparisons or allusions, which learned men suppose the apostle to have intended.—The mystery here spoken of seems very improperly confined, by many expositors, to the calling of the Gentiles; whereas, the mysterious salvation, by Emmanuel's righteousness and atonement, through faith, and by the new creation of his Spirit unto holiness, which the Gentiles were called to partake of in common with the Jews, and on which the apostle had before enlarged, and to which he was about to return (9), was also evidently intended. The former, as exclusive, is at best but a meagre interpretation; the latter perfectly agrees with the apostle's manner, when speaking on a subject, of which his heart was full.

Note.—The apostle here formed a new word, to express the deep sense which he had of his own unworthiness: this is very properly rendered, "less than the least of all the saints." He does not seem to have adverted exclusively or principally to his former conduct, as a persecutor and blasphemer. That indeed made him deem himself "the chief of sinners;" but here he speaks of himself as "a saint," though most mean and unworthy of that title. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, 1 Cor. 15:3—11, vv. 8,9. 1 Tim. 1:12—16.) In general, this must be ascribed to his unaffected humility, his self-knowledge, acquaintance with the holy law, near communion with God, and candor towards his brethren: and perhaps those humiliating infirmities, of which he repeatedly spoke, were in some degree taken into the account. But the consideration of his peculiarly aggravated crimes before conversion, and the unparalleled mercy and favor, which had been shown him, gave him such a sense of his immense obligations, and of the returns of love, gratitude, zeal, and holiness, which became him; that he regarded his attainments and experience much more beneath the proper standard, than those of any other true Christian. 'Surely,' thought he, 'no other believer loves the Lord, in a degree so disproportioned to his obligations, as I do!' All his obedience, labors, usefulness, and even sufferings, would be considered as so many additional favors bestowed on him: and that coldness of affection, or rising of evil in the heart, which he could bear with in others, he deemed inexcusable in himself. (Note, Rom. 7:18—25.) This did not, however, lead him to doubt of his being a saint; but only to stand more amazed at the love of the Lord toward him: and under this impression, he uttered the feelings of his heart in such energetic language, as very few can use with propriety or sincerity: though many employ the words, rather as expressive of what they ought to mean, than of what they really feel concerning themselves; and some no doubt, as affecting the praise of humility!—On so great a sinner, and so unworthy a believer, was this astonishing grace conferred; that he should be employed as an apostle, to preach among the idolatrous Gentiles, through many nations, "the unsearchable riches of Christ!" The immensity of the divine Redeemer's condescension and mercy; the preciousness of his blood and salvation; the fulness laid up in him, and the freeness with which it was bestowed; the privileges of his people, and their glorious inheritance; those "riches of Christ," which were not provided for himself, or for holy creatures, but purchased for the chief of sinners; for the payment of their debts, the ransom of their souls, and the enriching of them to all eternity; which sufficed for all the multitudes that ever had come, or should come to him for them, how many soever they were; which never could be exhausted or diminished, by the most liberal and profuse communication of them, or leave the glorious and gracious Proprietor less rich than before, to the ages of eternity: these are "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and they baffle the powers of computation, may even of imagination; they are incomprehensible and infinite. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Notes, John 1:16. 2 Cor. 8:6—9, v. 9. Col. 2:1—4, v. 3.) This was the great subject of the apostle's ministry among the Gentiles, whom he called to come and partake of "these unsearchable riches" by faith in Christ.—It may be very useful to compare the animated language of this chapter, with the cold reasonings of modern theologians, and their extreme caution lest they should speak too highly of Christ and his salvation.—The labors, perils, and sufferings of the apostle, in his preaching to the Gentiles, were so many and great; that nature would have deemed it an intolerably hard and perilous service, and declined it by every possible means: but grace, inspiring him with love of Christ, zeal for his glory, and a longing desire for the salvation of souls, made him think it an unspeakable privilege. (Notes, Acts 20:18—21. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) What an example, for modern missionaries! And what a view does it give us of the desirableness, the importance, and the honor of that service.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—This "preaching of the gospel, concerning the unsearchable riches of Christ," was appointed, that men of all nations and descriptions might perceive the happy "fellowship," or partnership, (so to speak) of Jews and Gentiles in the blessings of salvation; according to the mysterious plan, which had been formed from the beginning in the counsels of God, but had been hidden from his creatures in general; save as he had given some previous intimation of it "by his prophets," and had at length more fully discovered it by Jesus Christ, by whom, as the eternal Word, he at first created all things, and was now effecting a glorious new creation. (Marg. Ref. a—e.—Notes, John 1:1—3. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:1,2.) To the intent that angels and archangels, even "the principalities and powers," who were around the throne of God "in heavenly places," and had, from the beginning, witnessed and adored the displays of his wisdom, in the works of creation and providence, should now discover still more surprising and most gloriously and beautifully varied displays of it, in his church of redeemed sinners: while they beheld rebels changed into spiritual worshippers; all the Persons and perfections of the Godhead more abundantly glorified, even by means of man's apostasy; Satan's devices turned against him, and the most discordant characters united in one loving family, or as "one Body in Christ." (Marg. Ref. f—i.) All this was effected "according to the purpose of God," which from eternity he had conceived 'in his infinite mind, of saving sinners by Christ Jesus our Lord. Through faith in him, being made partakers of his salvation, both Jewish and Gentile believers

13 Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory.

Note.—As so great honors redounded to God, and blessings so rich and abundant were conferred on men, through the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles: the apostle was well satisfied with his sufferings on that account: and he entreated his brethren at Ephesus not to be discouraged, or to turn aside from their profession, on account of them; either for fear of being exposed to similar persecutions from the Jews; or through the insinuations of Judaizing teachers, who might attempt to prove, that Paul had done wrong in disregarding the legal ceremonies, and thus had needlessly exposed himself to persecutions. Whereas, his constant and patient endurance of sufferings, in defence of the liberty of the Gentile churches, was indeed an honor to them: it manifested the importance of their cause in his judgment, and it showed the temper of the bigoted Jews: it should therefore animate the Gentile converts to stand fast in the liberty of the Gospel.—The verse may indeed be rendered, "I pray not to faint at my tribulations for you:" but the sense given in our version, and by most expositors, is far more energetic, and far more in the manner of the apostle. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Phil. 1:12—14. 2:14—18. 1 Thes. 3:1—5.)

That ye faint not.] Μη εκκακειν. See on Luke 18:1. (Note, 2 Cor. 4:1,2.)

14 For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, 15 Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named;

16 That he would grant you, according

ing to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might, by his Spirit, in the inner man;

17 That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love,

18 May be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height;

19 And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.

Note.—The apostle could not go from place to place, as formerly, to establish the churches by his personal exhortations; but his affectionate desire of their prosperity was unabated: so that, during his imprisonment, he "bowed his knees" in constant prayer for them, "unto the Father of our Lord Jesus: of whom the whole family" of believers on earth, and saints and angels in heaven, "are named" and considered as the children of God, being gathered together in one in Christ. (Marg. Ref. o—r.—Note, 1:9—12.) To "the Father of the Lord Jesus," and of the whole family, the apostle prayed, that, "according to the riches of his glory," his plenteous mercy which was emphatically "his glory," he would grant them to be powerfully "strengthened by his Spirit," in all the holy dispositions of their renewed souls, in faith, reverential fear, love, gratitude, hatred of sin, hope, patience; that thus they might be steadfast amidst temptations and persecutions, enjoy comfort, and glorify God in every situation and duty. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, Ps. 138:3. Is. 40:27—31. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13. Col. 1:9—14, v. 11.) That Christ, being welcomed to their hearts by faith, to be their Lord and Saviour, "might dwell" there, as the Sovereign of all their affections and actions, and the source of all their joys: that so they might be "rooted," as a tree in a deep and fertile soil; and grounded as a building on a firm foundation, by their supreme love to Christ, and his salvation, cause, and people; and thus be secured from turning aside or growing negligent, and be rendered stable and fruitful in their profession: and that they might also be enabled to "apprehend" and understand, as all true saints did in some measure, the immensity of the love of Christ to his people. (Marg. Ref. x—b.) This had in it a "breadth" commensurate with the boundaries of the earth, as it extended to sinners of every nation and character; a "length" equal to the duration of the world, yea, extending from eternity to eternity; and a "depth and height" which might be contemplated in the abject state of deserved wretchedness, in which Christ viewed sinners, from the height of his essential glory, the depth of suffering and abasement to which he stooped for their salvation, and the height of present privilege and future felicity to which he advanced them. In short, the apostle prayed, that they might, spiritually and experimentally, "know the love of Christ, which passed knowledge," even that of all created beings; and could never be fully understood, being in all respects infinite and incomprehensible: that they might be so filled with heavenly knowledge, holy affections, and consolations, as to leave no room in their souls for error, ignorance, sin, or infelicity; but that the fulness of the divine power, grace, light, love, and joy, might wholly occupy their hearts; and that their powers might be so enlarged, as to receive more and more of these, till they should be "filled with," or "unto," "all the fulness of God," as his temple was with his glorious presence. (Marg. Ref. c.—e.—Note, 1 Kings 8:10—14.)—"The whole family in heaven and earth" (15), may include all holy creatures; but certainly none of the obstinate enemies of God. Perhaps the redeemed from among men are exclusively meant; and Christ, as the immediate antecedent, is He, from whom this family is named Christians.—"The height, &c." is here explained, as connected with "the love of Christ," mentioned in the following verse. But the glorious plan of redemption in general may be meant: this, however, does not materially alter the sense.

21 Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

Note.—The apostle added, to his most enlarged petitions, an act of adoration suited still more to exalt the expectations of the readers. He ascribed glory to God, as "able," not only to do all that he had asked, but "above all," "abundantly above all," "exceeding abundantly above all," not only which he or the Ephesians had asked, but even all which they had thought, desired, or imagined! So that they might stretch their thoughts, enlarge their desires, and multiply their most comprehensive petitions to the utmost; yet they never could reach the whole of what God was "able" to bestow upon them, or what he honorably could do for them in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) Nay, all which yet remained to be done, in order to complete their felicity and glory in soul and in body, was "according to that power," which had effected their redemption from the dominion of Satan, and their new creation to holiness; and which still upheld, preserved, and renewed them, amidst all their temptations and trials. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, 1:15—23. 2:4—10. Rom. 5:6—10. 8:32—34.) To this God of power and grace unspeakable, the apostle most earnestly desired, that glory, adoration, and praise, should continually be rendered, in every part of the church, by Christ Jesus, throughout all the ages of time, and to all eternity: and he closed this most rapturous act of devotion, by affixing his AMEN to these his prayers and praises. (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:10—20. Ps. 72:17—19.) In attempting to explain such portions of scripture, it is almost impossible to avoid comparative flatness and insipidity: an inspired writer alone could do justice to them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Should we be called to suffer, even unto bonds, in the cause of truth, and "as the prisoners of Christ;" we may hope to endure the cross with that cheerfulness and satisfaction which holy Paul expressed: but our feelings would be very different, if we should "suffer as evil-doers, or busy-bodies in other men's matters." This should teach Christians in general, and ministers especially, not to leave their proper employment, to which the dispensations of Providence and of divine grace have called them; and to seek continual instructions from the Lord, both as to "the mysteries" of the gospel, and the path of duty: that so their profiting in the knowledge of Christ, and their competency for the office assigned them, may be evident to all men.—We enjoy very great advantages for these studies; as the mysteries of redeeming love were not made known even to ancient prophets, so clearly as they now are to those believers in general, who are well acquainted with the word of God: (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) and our encouragement is propor-tionably great, as we "sinners of the Gentiles" are "fellow-heirs" with the ancient people of God in all the promised blessings, if we indeed are "in Christ" by faith in him, and by the participation of his holy Spirit. "The gift of the grace of God," and "the effectual working of his power," are necessary to form a guilty, depraved sinner into a faithful minister: and deep humility, united with exalted thoughts of Christ and his "unsearchable riches," are invariable characteristics of those, who are appointed and prepared in this manner to the sacred service. Indeed, when we consider our own sinfulness by nature and practice; and contrast the poverty of our attainments, the coldness of our affections, and the manifold defilements of our conduct, with our obligations and opportunities, and the glorious theme on which we ought to insist continually: we may well tremble at the thoughts of preaching, in the name of so holy and exalted a Saviour, even to the meanest of our fellow-rebels. But those "unsearchable riches of Christ," which we would recommend to others, may give ample encouragement to our own hearts: and our deepest humiliation will not abate our confidence of hope, if we duly advert to the power and love of our Redeemer. His "riches are as unsearchable" as ever: we should therefore invite "the chief of sinners" to leave their gilded toys and glittering indigence, to come and be enriched by Christ. We should earnestly desire and pray, that all men might know the blessedness of the communion of the saints, with God and with each other, through the mystery of the Person and mediation of Emmanuel, by whom all worlds were created, and our souls were redeemed; and by the communion of the Holy Spirit. While angels adore "the manifold wisdom of God," in his church of ransomed sinners, the ignorance of self-wise and carnal men pronounces the whole design to be foolishness! But they, who by faith are admitted to share those blessings, "according to the eternal purpose of God" in Christ, behold some glimpses of this glory, and are prepared for the adorations of heaven. With humble boldness, and reverential confidence, they are taught to approach "the throne of grace" by the faith of Christ: and thus they receive such supports and consolations, as keep them from fainting on account of those tribulations, which Satan and wicked men employ to discourage them; or which in any way are allotted to them.

V. 13—21.

Men of generous minds often consider more the effects which their sufferings may have on others than their own feelings under them: and they who know human nature will fear, lest others "should faint" on account of those trials endured by themselves for their sake, which are indeed their glory.—The instructions and admonitions of ministers or others should always be watered, as it were, with fervent prayers: and we may serve our brethren or relatives in this way, when precluded from all other methods. While therefore we "bow our knees before the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" as the Father of "the whole family in heaven and earth;" we should not fail to supplicate him in behalf of others in every part of the world; remembering "the riches of his glory," and entreating him to deal with us and with them according to them. Nor can we do better, than often to enlarge on the petitions before us; whether we are praying for ourselves, or our fellow-Christians. We should desire and ardently long, that "the Lord would grant unto us, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit" in all the graces of "the inner man;" (Note, Rom. 7:22—25.) that our hearts may be made the throne and temple of the Lord Jesus; that, in the daily exercise of faith, we may realize his gracious presence, experience his sanctifying consolations, and become more entirely devoted to his service; that, being "rooted and grounded in love" to him, his people, and his cause, we may be made "fruitful in every good work," and bold in professing our faith in him; that thus we may understand, experience, and enjoy more of his boundless love which passeth all comprehension, and will be more and more discovered and adored to all eternity; and that so at length "we may be filled unto all the fulness of God," being perfected for ever in knowledge, holiness, and felicity. In asking for such enlarged blessings, for ourselves and for all our brethren, we should not be straitened in our own minds; as we are not in our gracious God. He "is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we" ever yet asked or thought, or ever shall be able to ask or think as long as we live in this world. Let us then enlarge our expectations and multiply our supplications; encouraged by what he has already done for his church, and by his regenerating and upholding our souls: being assured that the conversion of sinners, and the increasing light, holiness, and comfort of believers, will rebound, in more abundant adorations and thanksgivings, to his "glory by Christ Jesus," in his whole church, and to all the ages of eternity. Amen, so be it. Let thy name, O Lord, be thus hallowed on earth, as it is, and ever shall be, in thy holy habitation above! (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10,13. Rev. 5:8—14. 19:1—6.)

CHAP. IV.

The apostle exhorts his brethren to a consistent walk in humility and love, as united by manifold, most endearing bonds, 1—6; to a peaceful improvement of gifts and endowments, and performance of duties, for the good of the church; from regard to the ascended Saviour, and the nature of his communications and appointments, for the edification of his saints, 7—16; to a conduct peculiarly distinguished from that of the Gentiles around them; being taught by Christ, dead to sin, and continually more and more renewed to the divine image, 17—24; to avoid deceit and anger, 25—27; to labor in what was good; and so to shun dishonesty, and to practice charity, 28; to use their tongues in holy discourse, and not in unholiness, 29; to beware of grieving the holy Spirit, 30; and to meekness and kindness, after the example of the love of God in Christ, 31, 32.

[Practical Observations]

Note.—(Note, 3:1-7, v. 1.) The apostle, as "a prisoner of the Lord," for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, exhorted and entreated his Ephesian brethren, whose best interests lay near his heart, to take peculiar care, that their habitual conduct, in the world and among themselves, might be worthy of their high "vocation." The privileges and prospects, to which the grace of God had called them, from a state of abject idolatry, ignorance, and vice; (Note, 2:11-22.) the obligations conferred on them; the plain and full instructions; the motives and encouragements afforded them; and every thing in the doctrine and love of Christ, as well as the nature of their future inheritance, required of them a peculiar temper and conduct; which he was about to point out to them in various particulars. (Marg. Ref. a, b, d.—Notes, Phil. 1:27-30. 1 Thes. 2:9-12.) Especially, he must exhort them to behave with "humility" and self-abasement, without self-preference, boasting, emulation, or contempt of others; and with "meekness," gentleness, and "long-suffering," even amidst great insults and injuries; as well as with a disposition to "forbear one another in love," as to those light occasions of offence or displeasure, which could not be wholly avoided even among believers, in their present imperfect state. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, 30-32. Matt. 18:15-17. John 13:31-35. Gal. 5:13-15. Phil. 2:1-4. Col. 3:12-15.) Thus they ought studiously and diligently to follow after peace and harmony with each other, according to the teaching and influences of the Holy Spirit; whose dwelling in all their hearts united them as Christians, and should induce them to live together, as bound in the closest amity and the nearest of all relations; notwithstanding difference of sentiment in some respects, and the manifold defects which they discerned in one another; and would be conscious of in themselves, if they carefully watched their own hearts. (Marg. Ref. g.) For, in truth, the whole church was "one Body," of which every believer was a member, and "Christ the Head;" this body was animated, as it were, by one life or soul, even the omnipresent Spirit of Christ: (Notes, Rom. 12:3-5. 1 Cor. 12:15-26.) all believers were called to "one hope" of the same eternal happiness, on the same ground of the word of God, warranted by the same experience of his converting and sanctifying grace. (Marg. Ref. h-k.—Notes, Rom. 5:3-5. Col. 1:25-27. 2 Thes. 2:16,17. 1 Pet. 1:3-5. 3:13-16. 1 John 3:1-3.) They had all "one Lord," Mediator, Protector, and Judge, under whom they had their several employments allotted to them. (Note, 1 Cor. 8:4-6.) They had all "one faith," both as to its Object, Author, nature, and efficacy; and they all believed the same doctrines in the great essentials of religion. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) They had all been admitted into the church, by "one baptism" with water, "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," as the sign of regeneration and the outward seal of the new covenant. (Marg. Ref. n.—Note, Matt. 28:19,20.) Thus they were all, whether Jews or Gentiles, become the worshippers of "one God," even "the Father" of all; who was infinitely above, and absolute Ruler over, all creatures; who pervaded and sustained all, and acted by all as his instruments; and who was indeed in them all, through Christ, and by his Spirit, being personally distinct from the Son, and the Holy Ghost, yet mysteriously one with them. (Marg. Ref. o-q.—Notes, John 14:21-24. 17:22,23. Rom. 11:33-36, v. 36. Col. 3:7-11.) They had therefore every possible motive to live in love and peace, as being united in so many important and endearing particulars. All divisions and discords, in these circumstances, must be peculiarly incongruous: yet the remains of in-dwelling sin, of pride, self-wisdom, self-will, ambition, resentment, with the devices of false brethren, and the stratagems of Satan, would tend to disunion: and it would require their most prudent and strenuous endeavors, to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:10-16. 13:4-7.)—It must be owned, as a certain 'truth, that nothing can unite us to that church, 'and Body, of which Christ is the Head, but 'the participation of the Spirit.' cended up on high, x he led * captivity captive, y and gave gifts unto men.

9 (Now that z he ascended, what is it but that a he also descended first into b the lower parts of the earth?)

10 He that descended is the same also that c ascended up far above all heavens, d that he might † fill all things.)

Note.—The common Head and Lord of the "one Body" before described, had freely conferred on every individual member gifts and grace, endowments, stations, and spiritual gifts, according to that "measure," by which, in his sovereign wisdom, he proportioned his bountiful communications to the wants and circumstances of his saints. This, therefore, every one ought thankfully to receive, and quietly to employ for the benefit of the whole, without envying, coveting, or disputing. (Marg. Ref. r—t.—Notes, Matt. 25:14—18. Rom. 12:6—8. 1 Cor. 12:4—11. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) With relation to this subject, the Lord had spoken, by the Psalmist, concerning the victories and exaltation of the Messiah; that when he "ascended up on high, and led captivity captive," even those enemies who had enslaved the human race, he "received gifts for men," "even for the rebellious;" that through the imparting of these gifts, the Lord God might dwell among them. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Note, Ps. 68:18.) Now if JEHOVAH (who was there evidently spoken of,) "ascended," what does this imply, but that he previously "descended into these lower parts of the earth?" So that the incarnation, abasement, death, and burial of Emmanuel, previous to his resurrection and ascension, were most clearly pointed out by the prophet. (Notes, John 3:12—15. 16:25—30.) He, who thus descended and abased himself, was the very same Person who also "ascended up far above all heavens," as placed over all the inhabitants of them; that he might fulfil all things relative to his mediatorial undertaking; that from his fulness he might fill his church, his ministers, and all believers, with his abundant gifts and graces; and that he might fill heaven and earth with his glory. (Note, 1:15—23, v. 23.) When he ascended, &c. (8) Not from the LXX; yet it varies from the Hebrew. (Ps. 68:18.) The Psalmist says, "He hath received gifts for men:" the apostle, "He gave gifts to men."—He received that he might give.—But of whom could he "receive gifts for men?" He, whose name is Emmanuel, received at his ascension, from the Father, those gifts which he conferred on men, his brethren. The death and burial of Christ, as well as his incarnation, seem to be intended.

11 And e he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, f evangelists; and some, g pastors and teachers;

12 For h the perfecting of the saints, i for the work of the ministry, k for the edifying of l the body of Christ:

13 Till m we all come, ‡ in the unity of the faith, and of n the knowledge of the Son of God, o unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the § stature of the p fulness of Christ:

Note.—Christ, having been exalted to his glory in heaven, first plenteously poured out the Holy Spirit on his chosen "apostles," as his invaluable "gifts to men;" that, through their ministry, and by the laying on of their hands, sinful men might be made partakers of his salvation, and of abundant spiritual gifts and miraculous powers: and that, from them, as the grand repository, the church, in all future ages, might receive all divine truth; especially by those sacred oracles which were written by them, and under their inspection, to be the standard of Christianity. He next qualified and raised up "prophets," or extraordinary teachers endowed with the gift of prophecy, and acting in subordination to the apostles, in making known his gospel in the world; others he qualified to be "evangelists," to preach from city to city, as assistants to the apostles, and observing their directions. He also qualified and appointed stated "pastors and teachers" in the different churches, to carry on the work begun by the apostles and evangelists. (Marg. Ref. e—g.—Notes, Matt. 16:19. Mark 16:14—18. John 20:19—23. 1 Cor. 12:27—31.) Thus the ascended Saviour, by sending forth able and faithful ministers, "gave gifts unto men," as through their labors he communicated "the Spirit of life and holiness" to mankind. This appointment was intended for "the perfecting of the saints" in knowledge and holiness, and for increasing their numbers; or, for "the perfecting of holy persons, to perform the work of the ministry" from age to age, for edifying, or building up, the spiritual temple, by bringing sinners, through faith, to be built on the true Foundation; (Note, 2:19—22.) and by increasing the fitness of believers for their several stations in the church; in order to the beauty, harmony, and proportion of the whole. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) The same grand design might also be illustrated, by considering the church as "the Body of Christ;" (Marg. Ref. l.—Note, 1 Cor. 12:15—26.) for it was intended by these gifts to nourish and mature that Body, till all believers were brought to that unity of faith, and agreement in doctrine, and that spiritual and experimental knowledge of the Son of God, in his Person, glory, and salvation, producing love, confidence, obedience, and conformity; which would render the whole "a perfect man," complete in every member, sense, and organ, and all grown up to maturity; according to that measure of capacity, gifts, and grace, which Christ allotted to every individual, in order to the proportion of the stature of his mystical body, "the fulness of him who fill-eth all in all:" that so the church on earth might, in each successive generation, bear some resemblance to the whole company, when being perfected in number, knowledge, holiness, union, and felicity, they shall meet together in heaven. (Marg. Ref. m—p.)—Evangelists. (11) 'Under this name they are to be understood, whom the apostles used as their attendants, in performing their office; because they were not sufficient for every thing. ... Of this kind were Timothy, Titus, Silvanus, Apollos, whom Paul joined with himself in the inscription of the epistles, yet so as to call himself alone an apostle. This office therefore was 'only temporary.' Beza. The opinion of this venerable Reformer, in the last clause, seems not well founded. The office of "Evangelists," in the primitive times, was in most respects, similar to that of missionaries, in subsequent times. They were preachers of the gospel, without full apostolical authority, and without any stated charge; going among the heathen to found churches; while the apostles lived, under their personal direction; and afterwards according to their doctrine and methods of proceeding: or, visiting the churches already planted, "to set in order such things as were wanting," to supply the deficiencies, or aid the labors, of stated pastors; and to stimulate them to greater earnestness in discharging their duty. When zeal for propagating the gospel subsided, this office sunk into disuse; and thus for ages, the heathen have been in a great measure neglected: and it seems to have been one grand defect at the Reformation, that no part of the funds, which had been appropriated to religious purposes, was reserved for the special object of supporting evangelists to the heathen world: but in one form or other, the office of "evangelist," or something of the same nature, must revive, along with the spirit of evangelizing the nations.—These, when they (the persons above-mentioned,) 'were employed in 'preaching the gospel to those who had not yet received it, the scripture calls Evangelists.' Hammond. (Notes, Acts 21:7—14. 2 Tim. 4:1—5.)—It might have previously been expected in the present lamentably divided state of the church, that the zealots of each division would find out their own plan of church-government, and their own orders of ministers, exclusively, in this passage: but it is probable, that none of them would be satisfied with so general a statement, were they called to write their sentiments on the subject.—It appears to me, that "bishops;" however the word may be understood, are included under the general terms, "pastors and teachers," as the principal resident rulers and teachers of the church. (Notes, Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1. Rev. 2:1.)—Were diocesan bishops more constantly resident, and more "instant in preaching the word," as well as in ruling the flock as "shepherds," their authority would be more revered, and their usefulness allowed. Note.—The whole plan before-mentioned was formed, in order that believers should no longer be (as many had been and were,) "like children" in knowledge and experience; (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. 14:20—25. Heb. 5:11—14.) and so, through instability, want of judgment, and weakness of faith, liable to "be tossed to and fro," as ships without ballast, by the waves of the sea: or "carried about" like clouds with the wind, by the false and pernicious doctrines, which subtle and ingenious men devised; and by the plausible reasonings and pretences, with which they propagated them: as, in this manner, Satan's ministers waited by the way for the professors of the gospel, to deceive and pervert them, for their own ambitious and selfish purposes. (Marg. Ref. q—t.—*Notes, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Cor. 11:13—15. 2 Pet. 2:17. stowed on him, that he might improve it, to promote the purity, peace, and edification of the church. Thus all Christians, as well as ministers, being taught to "hold," or "maintain, the truth in love;" uprightly professing and defending the great truths of the gospel, in meekness towards all men and love of each other, "might grow up in all things" to a nearer communion with Christ, and conformity to him, by influence derived from him, and by observing his directions: as members in that Body, of which he is the Head, from whom the whole receives all its life, vigor, and spiritual health. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) And being fitly proportioned, and closely united, through the gifts, grace, and services of each individual, and with the "effectual operation" of Christ by his Spirit, according to his appointed measure in every part; continual increase might be made to it, both by the conversion of sinners, and the sanctification of believers; and the whole be edified, united, adorned, and advanced, in love of Christ, and of every one to the others, with all the happy effects and fruits of love. In this respect the church would resemble the human body, which consists of various members, united by joints and ligaments: each part being proportioned to its place, and fitted for its use; the whole being compacted, by the nerves, arteries, veins, and the circulations continually carrying on, from the head and the heart, through every part of the whole. Thus it grows up from infancy to manhood, and is preserved in vigor and activity; while every part performs its proper function in union with the head, in perfect harmony with all the rest, and for the common good. (Marg. Ref. a—d.)—This shows the intent, tendency, and duties of the several stations of Christians in the church; and if these were more attended to, the resemblance would be more manifest, and the effects unspeakably beneficial. 19 Who, being <sup>n</sup> past feeling, have <sup>o</sup> given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness <sup>p</sup> with greediness.

Note.—In order that the Christians at Ephesus might "by love serve one another," the apostle next called on them, not only as a friendly monitor, but as "testifying" to them and charging them in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus; that they should not "henceforth," after having professed the gospel, conduct themselves in the same manner that the rest of the Gentiles did; but should manifest such a distinction of temper and behavior, as became their vocation. (Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, 5:8—14. Rom. 1:18—32. 1 Cor. 6:9—11. 1 Pet. 4:1—5.) For the Gentiles with whom they were surrounded, "walked in the vanity of their mind;" and their vain speculations and carnal affections concurred, in influencing them to choose and pursue worldly vanities, as their chief good; which was the natural effect of their vain idolatry. Their "understanding was darkened," through pride, prejudices, and lusts, and by the agency of Satan; (Notes, Acts 26:16—18. 2 Cor. 4:3, 4.) so that they were wholly averse to that life of spiritual obedience, which God requires and communicates, which accords to his own nature and felicity, and is the beginning and preparation for heavenly joys. This "alienation from the life of God," was the effect of their "ignorance" in every thing relating to true religion; and that ignorance arose, not so much for want of capacity, or of means of information alone, as from "the blindness of their hearts," and the obstinate depravity of their affections. (Marg. Ref. i—m.) Thus they stupified themselves with false principles, corrupting fables, and habitual excesses, till they lost all "feeling" of conscience, and sense of propriety, decency, and morality; (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) and so gave themselves up to the unrestrained indulgence of their sensual inclinations, by the greedy commission of the most unnatural and detestable uncleanness; as if their highest happiness had consisted in these far worse than brutal practices. 20 But ye have not so learned Christ;
21 If so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus:

22 That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts:

23 And be renewed in the spirit of your mind;

24 And that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Ephesians "had not so learned Christ," or that religion, of which Christ is both the Teacher and the Instruction, the centre of all doctrines, promises, ordinances, and duties; as to live after the manner of their heathen neighbors. (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, 2 Cor. 3:17,18.) Some indeed, had "learned Christ" from teachers, who paid little regard to practice: but the Ephesian church had been better instructed; "seeing" they had heard Christ himself, as it were, speak by his apostle, and had been thus "taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus;" laid up in him, as in a treasury, to be communicated from him to his church through his word and ordinances: or, "if so be they had been taught" by him; that is, by his Spirit as well as by his ministers: (Marg. Ref. r, s.) For indeed, "the truth as it is in Jesus" taught men, that they must "put off," in respect of the whole of their former conversation and behavior, "the old man," or that sinful nature, which they derived from fallen Adam, and which is corrupt in all its principles and affections, according to those various inordinate desires of worldly things, which mock men's expectations, deceive their souls, and make them deceivers of each other; and which may therefore be called "deceitful lusts;" or "lusts of deceit." (Marg. Ref. t—y.—Notes, Prov. 11:18. Rom. 7:9—12. Heb. 3:7—13.) The outward conduct, resulting from this corrupt nature, must be cast off at once, as a filthy garment; and the inward desires must be denied, crucified, and mortified, till wholly abolished. (Notes, Rom. 6:5—7. Col. 3:7—11.)—The Ephesians had also been taught, according "as the truth is in Jesus," that they must be continually "renewed" more and more, in the inward judgment, motives, and affections of their souls, by the power of divine grace, into the humble, spiritual, holy, and loving mind of Christ: that so they might "put on the new man;" and that their habitual conduct might be conformed to his example, and evince that they were "new created," after the image of God, "in righteousness and true holiness," or, "the holiness of truth," that is, evangelical holiness, even that holiness which springs from a real belief of "the truth in Jesus," consists in uprightness towards God and man, and produces true and genuine peace and satisfaction. (Marg. Ref. z—d.—Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. Ps. 51:10. Rom. 12:1,2. 13:11—14. Tit. 2:11,12.) These important and essential practical lessons they had been taught by the apostle, and by Christ himself, if indeed they were true Christians: and, in connexion with the means, motives, and assistances afforded them, they would effectually lead them to a conduct, entirely different from that of their Gentile neighbors.—The "corrupt conversation," including doubtless the bad habits, of the heathen is distinguished from "the old man," or the depraved nature, whence all these evils spring. The root would still remain, after the converts had "put off," concerning the former conversation, the old man;" and this would render watchfulness and diligence needful to the end, till "the body of sin should be abolished." (Notes, Jam. 1:19—21. 1 Pet. 1:13—21. 2:1—3.) If "the old man," means no more than bad habits, as many explain it; how does it come to pass, that these bad habits have always been so general, not to say universal; while good habits have been exceedingly rare, if any instances can be adduced, which never yet have been, in a satisfactory manner? We never read of bad habits, in any degree, among holy angels: nor would they have been heard of among men, if they had not apostatized from God, and become "dead in sin," and "by nature children of wrath." (Note, 2:1—3.)—The state of the unconverted Gentiles is indeed here particularly adverted to: yet it is most certain, that the nature of the unregenerate (nay, their practice also, except in respect of gross idolatry, and some of its abominable appendages,) is similar, even in those who are called Christians.

25 Wherefore, putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbor: for we are members one of another.

Note.—Let the Ephesian Christians then show, that they had “put off the old man with his deeds,” by “putting off” every kind of falsehood and deceit: let them no longer flatter, slander, defraud, amuse, or compliment others by any deviation from strict veracity and sincerity: but let every one of them speak the simple truth to his neighbor, without disguise, prevarication, simulation or dissimulation: seeing that men, both in the church, and in civil society, are “members one of another;” as all men are one in Adam, and all believers one in Christ. They ought not therefore in any way to deceive each other: but should think it as unnatural and preposterous to impose on one another, as for a schism to take place in the body, or for one sense or member of the body to delude or mislead another into mischief, to the common detriment of the whole.—Dr. Whitby ‘hath well shown, in his note on this passage, [that several of the best of the heathen moralists ‘thought lying might in many cases be justified: and I wish that none but heathens had ever taught so loose and dangerous a doctrine.’ Doddridge. (Note, Judg. 4:20.)

27 Neither give place to the devil.

Note.—It would be proper to express displeasure at what was wrong, on many occasions, in the management of families, in reproving sin, and even in ordering their temporal concerns; so that all anger was not absolutely prohibited: (Note, Mark 3:1—5, v. 5.) yet let Christians be very circumspect and vigilant to restrain that dangerous passion within the bounds of reason, meekness, piety, and charity; not being angry “without cause,” or above cause, or in a proud, selfish, and peevish manner; not expressing their displeasure by reproaches, or the language of vehement indignation; or suffering it to settle into resentment and malice: but always endeavoring to subordinate the exercise of it to the glory of God, and the benefit of the offender himself, as well as that of others; and to show stronger disapprobation of the sin committed against God, than of the injury done to themselves. (Marg. Ref. k.—Note, Matt. 5:21,22.) This would induce them to attend to the caution annexed, “Let not the sun go down upon their wrath,” and not to close the day without forgiving and praying for those who had offended them, or expressing a disposition to reconciliation and kindness. In this and in other respects, they must take peculiar care, not “to give place to the devil,” who watched his opportunity of filling their minds with rancor and malice, and of thus exciting divisions and contentions among them. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, 30—32. Ex. 20:13. 1 Sam. 2:23—25,29. 3:13. Prov. 14:17,29. 17:14. 19:11. Matt. 5:21,22. Jam. 1:19—21. 3:17,18.) —The words, “Be ye angry and sin not,” are taken from the LXX, (Ps. 4:4.) which is rendered in our version, “Stand in awe, and sin not.”—Neither give place, &c. 28 Let him that stole, steal no more: but rather let him labor, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth.

Note.—It might also be supposed, that, while the Ephesians were idolaters, many of them had practised various kinds of fraud and dishonesty, and indeed that some had even lived by theft, rapine, or oppression. (Note, Ex. 20:15.) These might not, in many cases, be able to make restitution, which, if they had it in their power, ought by all means to be done: (Notes and P. O. 1—6. Notes, Lev. 6:2—7. Num. 5:7,8. Luke 19:1—10.) but, at least, let every one finally cease from all kinds and degrees of this vice; and, rather than do wrong to any man in any respect, let each of them, however he had before lived in habits of ease and self-indulgence, learn and submit to, if necessary, even the lowest and most laborious employment, which was honest and useful to society; not only in order to provide food and raiment for himself and his family, but that he might be able to relieve the more urgent necessities of his sick and afflicted brethren and neighbors. (Notes, Acts 20:22—35. 1 Thes. 4:6—12. 2 Thes. 3:10—12.) Thus their Christian conduct would be as honorable, as their former behavior had been disgraceful. In this way, even the grand principle of restitution (namely, renouncing all right to property, which has been injuriously acquired,) would be adhered to, as far as their circumstances admitted of it; and a fund raised, among the vigorous and healthy poor, for the relief of the sick and aged.—Great stress seems in many places to be laid on this; which, in a very striking manner, shows to what an extent charitable communications, from the substance or gains of Christians, in every station of life, for the relief of their brethren, and of others for

Note.—In respect of the things above stated, and in all other respects, Christians should beware of "grieving the Holy Spirit of God."—"Give diligence, that the Holy Spirit may dwell in you willingly, as in a pleasant and agreeable habitation, and do not give him any cause for grief." He speaks here of the Spirit after the manner of men.' Beza. When a father has done every thing proper for the benefit of his son, he "is grieved" if his son acts in an unbecoming manner; and, consequently, will not be free and cheerful in his company; but will either shun him, or frown on him. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, 1:13,14. Rom. 8:18--23. 2 Cor. 1:21,22.) As a kind and wise Friend, the Holy Spirit watched over the Ephesian converts for their good, with infinite condescension and love: all their hope, wisdom, strength, and joy were from him; and the only return which he required, was a ready compliance with his holy suggestions, and a watchfulness against every thing of a contrary tendency. But if they yielded to anger, malice, selfishness, deceit, or sensual lusts; or used vain conversation, or yielded to negligence and unwatchfulness, as to the means of grace, or the duties of their respective stations; he would hide his face, or frown upon them, withhold his consolations, and leave them to darkness, fears and anxieties; or even to know their own weakness by such falls, as would expose them to sharp corrections.—In watching against these painful consequences, let them put away "all bitterness," and harshness of temper, language, and behavior, even toward such as most grievously offended them; and avoid all sinful anger, and clamorous disputes, revilings, slanders, and reproaches, as well as all malice and resentment: that they might be kind and tenderly sympathizing with each other, and ready to forgive, even as "God in Christ," through his atonement and mediation, and for his sake, had forgiven them. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

"The mind that was in Christ" will teach those who suffer for his sake, to be more desirous that Christians, and those especially with whom they are peculiarly connected, should "walk worthy of their vocation," than of their own exemption from the cross: and though we can do nothing towards our own justification; yet, by the grace of God, we may do a great deal for the honor of the gospel, and the benefit of mankind.—A spiritual, humble, obedient, and holy walk is peculiarly suitable to the character of our Saviour, and to the freeness and abundant grace of our salvation; as well as to the nature of our present privileges and future inheritance. Even the candor and allowance, which we are conscious of needing from our brethren, should teach us to act "with all lowliness and meekness; with long suffering, forbearing one another in love." If all who profess the gospel did indeed thus "endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," what a different face would the church of God assume! But alas! while there is "one Body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father of all," on whom all depend, and from whom all our hopes and comforts come; how grievously do the remaining ignorance, bigotry, and disproportionate zeal about comparative trifles, even in good men; the designing ambition and furious passions of bad men; and the artifices of the devil, defeat the endeavors of those who labor for peace; and perpetuate, yea multiply, divisions and dissensions among those who are agreed in the great essentials of Christianity! Let us, however, persevere in seeking and praying for the peace of the church; for "blessed are the peace-makers;" and, whatever eager zealots may say of us, we shall, in so doing, "be called the children of God." (Note, Matt. 5:9.) Let us watch and pray against spiritual pride, self-preference, vain-glory, envy, and the ambition of popularity and precedence, and selfishness in every form; for these are the grand sources of discord and contention.

V. 7—16.

We should severally improve our measure of endowment, as "the gift of Christ," for the benefit of others, with contentment and quietness: and it may be very instructive and encouraging to remember, that the Redeemer first came down from heaven, and abased himself, 350]

before he ascended as a triumphant Conqueror, to enrich us rebels with the fruits of his victories. Thus he "left us an example that we should follow his steps:" and expect abasement, self-denial, and the cross here; and honor and felicity hereafter.—While Christians should be exhorted to value the faithful ministry of the gospel, as the precious gift of Christ, and the principal means of salvation to their souls; "pastors and teachers," however distinguished, should be reminded of the grand purpose for which they were appointed, even "for the perfecting of the saints, and for the work of the ministry," and not for the emolument or reputation or rank in society connected with it; and for the edification of the body of Christ, not for the indulgence of themselves, or the advancement of their families to wealth or preferment, with the treasures or patronage intrusted to their stewardships, that with them they may promote the cause of true religion, and of which stewardship they must at length give a strict account. We should then "take heed to ourselves and to our doctrine," and labor to bring those among whom we minister, to "the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God," and to that maturity of judgment and experience, which may fit them to be a part of that complete Body, "according to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." For, by leading believers, with gradual advances, to this ripeness of knowledge; we most effectually counteract "the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness by which they lie in wait to deceive;" as their success is chiefly among unstable professors, or those Christians who, being "children in understanding," are liable to be "tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine," and by every subtle device of the enemy. (Notes, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Pet. 2:12—14.)—We should indeed "hold the truth with firmness," but it should also be "in love;" otherwise zeal for orthodoxy may dictate such violent measures, as shall more distract the church, and injure the cause of Christ, than false teachers themselves could do. But by "faith which worketh by love," we "grow up into Christ in all things," and, acting in a believing and loving spirit, every minister and Christian, as a part of that Body of which Christ is the Head, contributes to the proportion, union, and prosperity of the whole; "according to his effectual working in every part." Thus the church is increased in holiness and in numbers, "by edifying itself in love." (Note, Acts 9:31.) Indeed, every congregation, where the truth is preached, will prosper and increase, according to the measure in which this peaceful and loving improvement of every one's talents, for the common benefit, is attended to: for "the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace;" but "where envying and strife are, there is confusion and every evil work." (Notes, Jam. 1:19—21. 3:13—18. P. O.)

Let all ministers "testify in the Lord," with all solemnity and authority, against unchristian tempers and practices, as well as against false doctrines; and insist upon it, that believers must not "walk as others do," who are Gentiles in conduct, though Christians in name: for the difference between heretofore and “henceforth,” is of immense importance in this grand concern. (Notes and P. O. 1 Pet. 4:1—6.) Alas! do not men on every side, though called Christians, “walk in the vanity of their minds?” Is it not plain, that “their understandings are darkened,” and their hearts “alienated from the life of God,” and even hardened against it, “through the ignorance that is in them?” Nay, are there not numbers, who “are past feeling, and have given themselves over to work all uncleanness with greediness?” Must we not then insist, most decidedly, upon the distinction between real and nominal Christians? Indeed, there are many professors of evangelical truth, who have so perversely received the gospel, as not to be convinced of the necessity of mortifying their corrupt nature and its deceitful lusts, of being “renewed in the spirit of their minds,” and of “putting on the new man, which is created after God in righteousness and true holiness!” But, if we have truly “learned Christ,” from the teaching of his Holy Spirit, accompanying and blessing the word of God to our souls; we shall be daily aiming to practise these instructions, seeking help from God by fervent prayer: we shall mourn, that so much power yet remains in our old corrupt nature, and we shall long to be rendered day by day more like our divine Master, in every part of our spirit and conduct towards God and man.

V. 25—32.

Zealous professors and admired preachers of evangelical truth; nay, even true Christians, need warning and cautioning to avoid immoral practices: but the upright welcome and profit by the word of exhortation; while hypocrites detect themselves by raging against it, and disdaining it.—Those who most carefully watch over and examine themselves, will most clearly perceive the extreme difficulty of adhering to exact “truth” and sincerity in all their conversation, and of avoiding every kind and degree of falsehood: they also find it very difficult to feel and express anger, on the most justifiable occasions, and to perform the duties of parents, masters, or ministers, without falling into sin, and dishonoring their profession. They perceive it very necessary, to watch and pray against resentment; lest “the sun should go down upon their wrath,” and so place should be given for Satan to tempt them to further transgressions: for, in every thing, the occasions of his suggestions should be most vigilantly and assiduously avoided.—Even exact and scrupulous honesty in all things is far more uncommon, than is generally imagined; nay, many truly pious persons do things not strictly just, for want of being instructed and admonished after the apostolical manner. But, though thieves and robbers are as welcome, when they come to the Saviour by penitent faith, as their more moral neighbors; yet, thenceforth they must “steal no more,” whatever hard labor may be necessary for a mean, frugal, and honest livelihood. What then shall we think of those professed Christians, who grow rich and live in luxury, by various frauds and oppressions, by excessive profits, by smuggling and other acts of injustice, without restitution or amendment! And if the poor laborer ought to “give to him that needeth;” what shall we think of those, whose large revenues, and immense expenses or hoardings, are far out of all proportion to their penurious and scanty alms?—If we would act according to our obligations as Christians, our discourse also must be kept pure, our tongues bridled, and the gift of speech diligently improved as a talent; that so we may not, with this “unruly member,” do mischief to others; but may speak such pious and instructive words, as are suited “to minister grace to the hearers.” When we in any degree or respect neglect these rules, we “grieve the Holy Spirit of God,” lose our comfort and evidence, and even bring our state into doubt and suspicion. Let us then watch against all the evils here stated, and against all anger and malice, and every violent and malignant temper; and in all things copy diligently the loving example of our God and Saviour.

CHAP. V.

The apostle exhorts the Ephesians, to imitate the love of God in Christ, 1, 2, to avoid all uncleanness, covetousness, and improper discourse, which draw down the wrath of God upon “the children of disobedience,” 3—6; to have “no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness;” but, as the “children of light,” to improve them, 7—13; to walk with wisdom and circumspection, 15—17; not to seek exhilaration by excess of wine, but to “be filled with the Spirit,” speaking and singing Psalms and praises to God, 18—20; and to submit to one another, in the several relations of life, 21. The duties of wives and husbands, enforced and illustrated, by the mutual love of Christ and his church, 22—33.

Note.—(Note, 4:30—32.) Instead of the violent and malignant passions, mentioned at the close of the preceding chapter, the believers at Ephesus were exhorted to “follow,” or imitate God, as his beloved children, in all his moral perfections, especially in that love from which their salvation flowed. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) This might best be contemplated in the person and love of Christ, who had assumed human nature, and “given himself for them an offering or sacrifice to God;” which was to him “a sweet-smelling savor,” in allusion to the typical sacrifices consumed on the altar. (Marg. Ref. f. Note, Gen. 8:20—22.) Not that the Father could take pleasure in beholding the intense sufferings “of his beloved Son,” in whom “his soul delighted,” on their own account: but his justice and holiness were thus glorified, and a way was opened for the honorable exercise of mercy towards those who deserved his awful vengeance; and in this display of his glory he was well pleased. The Father showed his love and mercy to us, in “not sparing his own Son, but delivering him up for us all;” and the Son manifested his love to us, by “giving himself for us.” And to be “followers of God” is to “walk in love, as Christ hath loved us:” for, says he, “I and the Father are One.” (*Marg. 3 But <sup>s</sup> fornication, and all uncleanness, or <sup>h</sup> covetousness, let it not be once <sup>i</sup> named among you, <sup>k</sup> as becometh saints;

Note.—The apostle had, in the foregoing chapter, warned the Ephesians against several of those immoralities, to which they had been addicted before their conversion; and he here resumes that subject. (Note, 4:25-29.) The degree, in which “fornication” in particular, and other kinds of licentiousness, were practised and even allowed, nay, excused or vindicated, not only by poets, but even by grave philosophers of the Gentiles, can hardly be conceived by those who are not conversant with their writings. The exhortation, therefore, as it respects these vices, needs little comment: but many learned men maintain, that the word rendered “covetousness,” means an insatiable craving after more and more of these sensual indulgences. Now, it cannot be denied that the word sometimes has that sense, yet it can hardly be supposed, that the apostle would, in so general a way, have added to his warning against fornication, the mention of that “uncleanness with greediness,” which he before had stated, as the excess of Pagan blindness and hardness of heart. (Note, 4:17-19.) On the other hand, can it be thought that “covetousness” should here, and in all other exhortations of a similar nature, which the apostle addressed to the churches, be almost if not entirely overlooked? For those who explain the word in this text, of greediness in lewdness, put the same construction on it in many other places where it occurs.—No doubt “covetousness,” or the eager desire of gain, whether to hoard, or to support extravagance, is as contrary to vital Christianity, as the grossest sensualities; though more plausible and not so easily defined. It also supplies the means, in many cases, of silencing or softening the reproofs of those, who would firmly protest against “fornication,” and even prosecute the offenders with the censures of the church.—The clause, “Let it not once be named, &c.” may only mean, “Let it not be said, that a ‘Christian is guilty of such crimes.’” But, if understood of the discourse, in which the “naming” licentious practices, in a manner too common, tends to pollute the imaginations, or inflame the passions of the hearers: it cannot be doubted, that the conversation of those, who speak as if every thing was valuable in proportion as money can be got or saved by it, corrupts the judgment and principles of men, though in another way, yet as effectually as obscene discourse. It seems also to be with peculiar propriety, that the apostle joined this odious vice with these others more generally scandalous. (Notes, Col. 3:5, 6. 1 Tim. 6:6-10.) Neither the one, nor the other, should be mentioned without detestation; for this “became,” or suited their character as saints, and their relation to God as his children, as members of Christ, as temples of the Holy Spirit, as heirs of heaven, and as lights in the world. Nay, they must not allow of any indecent conversation, or any thing vain and trifling; or even of those witty turns of expression, by which improper sentiments, being conveyed in an ingenious manner, obtain applause, instead of exciting indignation, and poison the mind more unsuspectedly. Nothing of this kind could consist with the character of Christians; who ought rather to converse together on the mercies of God, and unite in thanksgivings for them.

7 Be * not ye therefore partakers with them.

Note.—The apostle here supposed his readers to know, that “fornicators, unclean persons, and covetous men” were out of the way to heaven. “The covetous,” though often more favored than debauched characters, were, in the strictest sense, “idolaters;” seeing they loved, trusted, and expected happiness from wealth rather than from God; and sought to increase or secure their treasures, instead of seeking first his favor, image, and glory. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, Ex. 20:3. Ps. 10: 2—11. 1 Tim. 3:3. 6:6—10, vv. 9,10. Tit. 1: 5—9. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. 2 Pet. 2:1—3,12—14.) They were not therefore truly converted; and, not being subjects of Christ’s kingdom on earth, they could not be entitled to “inherit” his heavenly kingdom. Some might indeed argue against this declaration: and, palliating these evils, or amusing themselves with speculations on the mercy of God and the freeness of salvation, might persuade others, that they were not absolutely inconsistent with a state of acceptance. But let none suffer any man to “deceive them with vain words;” as these very crimes brought the wrath of God upon “the children of disobedience,” or those who persisted in unbelief, impenitence, and the allowed practice of sin. (Note, 2:1,2.)—Indeed, “vain words” of various kinds, by which men deceive themselves and each other, might be adduced, did our limits permit. The common principles which prevail, in countries professing Christianity, among those who think themselves far removed from an antinomian perversion of evangelical truth, dictate “vain words” which deceive vast multitudes: while they consider Christians as under a remedial law, which does not require that strictness, which the holy moral law of God does; that faith compensates for failures even in this relaxed obedience; and that they may safely indulge in such things, under the gospel, as they must not venture on, if they were “under the law.”—A smattering of vain philosophy also, united with these common notions, leads numbers to conclude, that God will not punish men for indulging their natural inclinations, however irregularly. Many popular writers, of late, have spoken of “fornication,” and even the seduction of an unmarried woman, as no crime; or, merely as “indulging the most amiable weakness of human nature!” In these, and in various other ways, ingenious men, and even philosophers, by “moral essays” (so called) in modern times, deceive millions “with vain words;” and, no doubt, the grand deceiver of mankind had prophets of a similar stamp in ancient days. (Marg. Ref. r—t.)—

When the most atrocious transgressors repent, and believe the gospel, they become “children of obedience,” from whom the wrath of God is turned away: but it could not be expected, that he would punish the ignorant Gentiles for such abominations, and yet connive at them in professed Christians. (Note, 8—14.) If, therefore, those whom the apostle addressed, expected to escape the condemnation of their heathen neighbors, let them not partake of their crimes. (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Gal. 5:19—21. Col. 3:5—11. Rev. 21:5—8. 22:14,15.)

made "light in the Lord," as One with Christ, "the Light of the world." (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, John 1:4—9. 3:19—21. 8:12. 12:34—36.)—Let them therefore "walk as children of light;" like persons, who were born again into the spiritual world, to be trained up as heirs of the light of heaven. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, 1 Thes. 5:4—11. 1 Pet. 2:9—11.) If they were inwardly enlightened; the Holy Spirit, by whom the change had been wrought, would lead them to a suitable conversation: as "the fruit of the Spirit" consisted in all kinds of goodness, mercy, equity, integrity, veracity, sincerity, and faithfulness; as well as in uprightness in their professed faith, fear, and love of God. (Marg. Ref. b.—e.—Note, Gal. 5:22—26.) Let them then "prove," or make trial of, those things which God accepted and delighted in; and seek solid enjoyment in them. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Note, Rom. 12:2.) But let none of them countenance or join in those "works of darkness," from which worldly men sought pleasure and profit; but which were wholly "unfruitful," and yielded no present real advantage, to counterbalance in any degree the future ruin to which they led. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Note, Rom. 6:21—23, v. 21.) On the contrary, let them "reprove" such vices in their neighbors, by avowedly refusing to join in them, by protesting plainly against them, by showing their hateful nature and pernicious tendency; or by keeping a significant silence, when more explicit reproof might be unsuitable. For indeed it was "a shame even to speak of" the practices, which the heathens secretly committed; not only in taverns and brothels, but more especially in the most sacred mysteries of their abominable religion! (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Notes, 3, 4. Rom. 1:24—27.) The light, however, of divine truth, held forth in an open profession, and a suitable walk and conversation, could not fail to detect and expose the detestable nature of such shameful practices. For whatever thus tended to make things manifest, according to their real nature, was "light," and equivalent in the spiritual world, to the light of the sun in the natural world. (Marg. Ref. o.—Note, John 3:19—21.) With a view to this, according to the tenor of the Old Testament prophecies, (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, Is. 60:1—3.) the Lord now called on sinners of the Gentiles to "awake" from the sleep of sin, and their vain dreams of worldly happiness; yea, to arise from "the death of sin;" and Christ would, by his doctrine and Spirit, give them sufficient light to discover and escape every danger, and to find the way of peace and holiness. (Marg. Ref. q, r.)—Surely, this one text ought for ever to silence the vain speculations of those, who, arguing from figurative expressions concerning the state of sinners as asleep, nay, "dead in sin," not only object to, but absolutely condemn as heresy, the most scriptural addresses and calls on them to repent and turn to God, and believe in Christ and seek salvation!—Ye were darkness, &c. (8) What then is that 'light of nature,' of which some speak as sufficient, without the gospel, to lead the Gentiles to heaven?

Note.—With these abundant advantages, the Ephesians ought to see to it, that they "walked accurately," well considering what conduct became them; or, "with exactness," according to the commands and example of Christ; keeping the direct way, "abstaining from all appearance of evil," and aiming at more complete obedience in every particular: and "circumspectly," cautiously looking at their paths, to shun the snares laid in them; not acting as heedless, ignorant, or foolish persons, who rush into dangers, temptations, and mischief, but as "wise men," who are aware of them and escape them. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, Prov. 4:23—27.) As a great part of their lives had been wasted and grievously misemployed in heathen darkness, they ought also to improve their time for the future the more diligently, "redeeming," or buying it off from all avocations, at the expense of much self-denial and watchfulness; that they might spend et in religious exercises, or in doing good to others according to the duties of their stations, and as opportunities were given to them. For "the days were evil;" and the persecutions which awaited them, would render the term of their usefulness more precarious, than in peaceful seasons: as they might be suddenly shut up in prison, or cut off by martyrdom: so that if they would secure their own salvation, or do good to mankind, no time was to be lost. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Ec. 9:10. John 9: 4—7.) Let them not then be as "unwise" servants, who are not prepared for their Lord's coming, and are ignorant of their work: nay, let them spare no pains to understand "his will" concerning them; that they might serve him intelligently as well as zealously, and without giving their enemies any advantage against them. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, Phil. 1:9—11. Col. 1:9—14.) Instead of joining or imitating the revels of their neighbors, or seeking exhilaration by intemperate drinking, which induced a temporary insanity, and various disorders both of body and mind, and led to the most ruinous and mischievous conduct; let them wait on God in every appointed means, for larger communications of the Holy Spirit, whose sacred influences would fill their souls with satisfying consolation in every circumstance, and tend to the happiest consequences in future; and in which there was no danger of excess. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) In order to this, they should substitute, in the place of the loose odes and songs of the Gentiles, or other frivolous conversation, the "psalms and hymns" of the sacred scripture, and such "spiritual songs" as pious men composed, on the peculiar subjects of the gospel, and according to the doctrine of truth. In these they should "speak to themselves," or to each other: attending especially to the affections of their hearts; that the inward "melody" of holy love and gratitude unto the Lord, might unite with the outward melody of poetry and singing, when they used them in this manner, either alone or in social worship. (Marg. Ref. e—g.) It was incumbent on them also to "give thanks always," even in seasons of persecution and affliction; and "for all things," not excepting such as nature disrelished, being satisfied of their salutary tendency. Thus let them acknowledge their manifold obligations to God, even the Father, "in the name of Christ," through whom alone blessings were bestowed on sinful creatures, and praises accepted from them. 21 <sup>k</sup> Submitting yourselves one to another <sup>l</sup> in the fear of God.

Note.—In order to "glorify God" and "adorn the gospel," it was requisite that Christians should "submit to one another," and to all who had authority, according to their different situations and relations in the church, the community, or the family, and the subordination established by the word or providence of God. This should be done, not so much from secular motives of propriety and expediency, as "in the fear of God," and from a reverential regard to his authority, his favor, and glory; which would obviate those multiplied excuses, that might be made for the neglect of this submission, on account of the misconduct of superior relations, and on various other grounds. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. 13:1—7. 1 Cor. 7:17—24. Tit. 3:1—3. 1 Pet. 2:12—25. 5: 5—7.)

Submit. <sup>l</sup> Υποτασσομενοι. 22, 24, 1:22. Luke 2:51. See on Rom. 8:7. The kind and compliant conduct of the superior relations may be enjoined in an indirect way; but it cannot be directly meant by this word. (Note, Ex. 20:12.)

23 For <sup>o</sup> the husband is the head of the wife, <sup>p</sup> even as Christ is the Head of the church: and <sup>q</sup> he is the Saviour of the body.

24 Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be subject to their own husbands <sup>r</sup> in every thing

27 That <sup>z</sup> he might present it to himself <sup>a</sup> a glorious church, <sup>b</sup> not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; <sup>c</sup> but that it should be holy and without blemish.

Note.—As a most important instance of that "submission to one another in the fear of God," the apostle exhorted "wives to submit themselves to their own husbands;" such subjection being an essential part of their obedience "unto the Lord," who had appointed that it should be rendered, in all things lawful, for his own glory and the benefit of mankind. For the husband was constituted "the head of the wife," as her ruler and protector, both in Providence, and by the law of God: even as Christ was "the Head of the church," and the Saviour of this his mystical body. (Marg. Ref. m—q.—Note, 1 Cor. 11:2—16.) The government of Christ, and the subjection of the church, are highly conducive to the benefit of the latter, as his authority is that of wisdom and love: and in general it is beneficial to the women to "be subject to their own husbands," in the same manner that "the church is subject to Christ;" though the rule may admit of some exceptions. (Notes, Gen. 3:16. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) But to render submission more easy, beneficial, and comfortable, "husbands" also are commanded to "love their wives," with that tender, constant, faithful, and compassionate affection, which Christ showed to the church. (Marg. Ref. s.) He had even "given himself" to the death upon the cross, in order to save his people from their sins; that, having atoned for their guilt, he might also cleanse them from their pollution, by those influences of the Holy Spirit, of which the baptismal water was the external sign; and which were communicated through the word, as the means of their conversion and progressive sanctification. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, John 3:4,5. 17:17—19. Tit. 3:4—7. Heb. 10:19—22. 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 3:21, 22.) Thus, the heavenly Bridegroom prepares the whole multitude of his people, his one espoused bride, for the completion of the sacred union; that he may "present her to himself," as the object of his choice, the purchase of his blood, and the work of his grace, a glorious and glorified church, not having one remaining spot of sin, or wrinkle of imperfection, or any thing of the kind; but made complete in holiness, without the least remaining blemish. 28 So ought men to love their wives<sup>d</sup> as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife, loveth himself.

31 For<sup>h</sup> this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.

Note.—The apostle, having described in the most affecting manner "the love of Christ to his church," and the subjection of the church to his authority, here shows, that men ought to love their wives with a wise, holy, constant, and tender affection, in conformity to that perfect pattern: in every thing seeking their comfort and advantage, sympathizing in their sorrows, bearing with their infirmities, and endeavoring to promote their salvation and sanctification. They ought indeed "to love them even as their own bodies:" for so intimate and indissoluble is this endeared relation, in its original intention, and when properly entered upon and attended to; that a man in "loving his wife" may be said "to love himself;" as her comfort and happiness are, and should be deemed, inseparable from his own. Now, no man in his senses, can "hate his own flesh," or take pleasure in wounding and paining it: but self-love teaches him "to nourish and cherish it," even as the Lord does his church, and every believer in it; each of whom he graciously considers as a member of his body, and, as it were, a part "of his flesh and of his bones." Thus "ought men to love their wives," be tender and kind to them, and provide for their comfort. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, Deut. 24:5. Prov. 5:15—19. Ec. 9:7—9.)—What an affecting view does this give of Christ's love to his people! "He loves, and nourishes, and cherishes them," as a man does his own body!—To instruct us in these duties, the Lord, by the original institution of marriage, commanded men to leave even their parents, in order to join interests and affections with their wives, as if they became indissolubly one body or one flesh with them. All contrary to this, and short of this, is the effect of sin, and ought to be peculiarly guarded against: that so, every man may consider the wife of his choice, or rather of God's choice for him, as a part of himself, whom he cannot injure without injuring himself, and who cannot be hurt without his sharing the harm; even as if any part of his own body had been wounded. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Gen. 2:21—24. Mat. 2:13—16. Matt. 19:3—6. Mark 10:2—12. 1 Cor. 6:12—17. 7:1—5.)

33 Nevertheless,<sup>l</sup> let every one of you in particular so love his wife, even as himself; and the wife see that she<sup>m</sup> reverence her husband.

Note.—"This is," indeed, says the apostle, "a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the church." This was the "great mystery," of which marriage was a shadow, or emblem, especially in its primary institution. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) "Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular" thence learn, in what manner to "love his wife, even as himself," and be supplied with motives so to do; and every woman to respect and honor the person and authority of the husband, as constituted her head by the law and Providence of God. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Note, 1 Cor. 11:2—16.) It is obvious, that there must, in all cases, be manifold defects and failures on both sides, in the present state of human nature; and often grievous offences may be committed: yet this does not materially alter the duty of the injured party, except in some cases elsewhere provided for. (Notes, Matt. 5:31,32. 19:7—9. 1 Cor. 7:6—16.) Indeed, a great part of the difficulty and duty consists in persevering good behavior, notwithstanding unsuitable returns.—It is observable that the apostle says, “let every one love his wife,” not wives; so that polygamy is not even supposed by the exhortation to exist among Christians.—Mystery. (32) The vulgate, or the old Latin version exclusively used by the church of Rome, renders this, sacrament; which is the only scriptural reason, or shadow of reason, for the absurdity of numbering marriage among the sacraments, even while that church considers the married state inconsistent with high attainments in holiness, forbids its priests to marry, and discourages marriage in various other ways!—Many have enlarged on this mystery, namely the appointment of marriage in the garden of Eden, as a type or emblem of Christ and his church; for so they understand it. The following quotation gives the substance of ancient and modern expositions of the passage, in this particular.—“Adam, in whom the whole human race began, was a natural image of Christ, in whom the human race was to be restored: and his deep sleep, the opening of his side, and the formation of Eve of a rib taken out of his side, were fit emblems of Christ’s death, of the opening of his side on the cross, and of the regeneration of believers by his death. The love which Adam expressed towards Eve, and his union with her by marriage, were lively emblems of Christ’s love to believers, and of his eternal union with them in one society after the resurrection. And Eve herself, who was formed of a rib taken from Adam’s side, was a natural image of believers, who are regenerated, both in their body and mind, by the breaking of Christ’s side on the cross. ... These circumstances ... we may suppose ... to prefigure that great event; and by prefiguring it, to show that it was decreed of God from the beginning.” Macknight.—The mystery in reality is, that he, “who is God over all, blessed for evermore,” should, from most free love of Adam’s fallen race, become Man, Emmanuel, and thus “purchase the church with his own blood;” and should love this church of redeemed sinners, with a love immensely exceeding that of the most endeared relations among men. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 13:10,11. John 15:12—16. Rom. 5:6—10. 1 John 3:1—3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Wicked men follow the example of “their father the devil,” and may be known as his progeny. (Notes, John 8:41—47. 1 John 3:7—10.) Surely then, the “beloved children of God” should imitate his holiness, and ought especially to walk in love with their brethren and their neighbors, and even with their enemies, “as Christ hath loved them.” The perfection and obligations of this example are infinite: so that there is no kind or degree of self-denying, liberal, laborious, patient, or forgiving love, to which it will not direct and animate the grateful believer.—We should always keep in mind our character as Christians, and inquire whether this or the other part of our conduct “becometh saints,” the redeemed, sanctified, and devoted worshippers of God. This will teach us, not only that gross sensualities, and avarice, are utterly inconsistent with our relation to God; but that every inexpedient indulgence, and every degree of selfishness must be avoided. It is not enough to avoid all “filthiness and foolish talking;” even witty and ingenious repartees, which would ensure applause, must be repressed, with great self-denial, when they in the least infringe upon purity, piety, or charity, and are unsuitable to the Christian character. Our social intercourse ought to be conducted entirely in another manner, in subserviency to mutual improvement; which will best be promoted by declaring the loving-kindness of the Lord, and celebrating his praises.—But the faithful instructor must not only specify what practices are wrong: in many things he must insist upon it, that they “who do them have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ;” and warn men not to be “deceived with vain words,” and so emboldened to those crimes, for which “the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience;” that they may be put on their guard, and refuse to “be partakers with them.” The darkness of paganism, and even that of many nominal Christians, may seem to accord with various evil practices; but those who profess the gospel should consider themselves as “light in the Lord;” and if they indeed are “the children of light,” the Spirit of God will lead them far from all the scenes of sensual, riotous, and dissipated pleasure; and cause them to bring forth the fruit of “goodness, righteousness, and truth.” (Notes, Rom. 8:1,2,12,13.) Yet, even they need exhortations “to walk in the light,” and “to prove” more fully “what is acceptable to the Lord;” to avoid all degrees of “fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness,” and boldly to protest against them by word and deed; to let the light of their holy conversation so “shine before men,” that sinners may be convicted in their own consciences, even in respect of those “secret” crimes, of which it is a shame to speak, write, or preach, in a particular manner. (Notes, Matt. 5:13—16. Phil. 2:14—18.) For the holy converse and conduct of a consistent Christian is of the nature of light: it manifests that the contrary conduct of others is inexcusable; and his very silence is often most emphatically eloquent and convincing. After the example therefore of prophets and apostles, we should call on those, who are “asleep and dead” in sin, to “awake and arise, that Christ may give them light;” and the Lord will employ such warnings and invitations to “quicken” with divine life some or many of the ignorant, the careless, the self-satisfied among our hearers, and so guide them into the ways of peace and salvation, even as he uses the further instructions of his ministers, to guide the converted in the paths of holy and joyful obedience. (Note, Is. 42:13—17.)

By the light of divine truth we should walk with accuracy and "circumspection;" "redeeming our time" from sloth, needless sleep or recreation, and impertinent visits, for useful and important purposes; because life, health, liberty, and the use of our senses and understandings, are at all times uncertain. The world also is full of misery and iniquity; and there is "no work nor counsel ... in the grave, whither we are going." Let us then acquaint ourselves with the will of our Lord, attend to his work, and wait for his coming. Thus we shall practically show our wisdom; while many prove their folly by speaking frequently and earnestly about religion, without knowing or doing the will of the Lord. (Note, Jam. 3:13—16.) When we are afflicted, or wearied, or depressed, let us not have recourse to a vain exhilaration, by any kind or degree of intemperance, which is hateful and pernicious, and ends in deeper dejection: but, by fervent prayer, let us seek to be "filled with the Spirit," and to be satisfied with his holy consolations; and let us avoid whatever may grieve our gracious Comforter. Thus we shall be animated to "speak to each other in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs;" instead of those vain songs, in praise of war, sensual love, hunting, drinking, and such like, which are in use among men called Christians, just as odes to Mars, Venus, Bacchus, or Diana were among the Gentiles. Let us at least with the melody of a grateful heart, "give thanks always, for all things to our God and Father, in the name of" his beloved Son: and thus we shall anticipate the joys of heaven, in the communion of the saints on earth.

V. 21—33.

If we all were "subject one to another in the fear of God," and according to our several relations in life; society would appear like a well organized body, and every individual would share the advantages.—Every relative duty should be enforced, by evangelical motives and examples.—The most entire submission of wives to their own husbands will be no infringement of their liberty, if performed "for the Lord's sake;" and after the example of the church's obedience to him: especially if "husbands also love their wives," after the pattern of Christ's love to his chosen people. He died for them, "that he might sanctify and cleanse them," to be to him for an honor and praise to all eternity, and that he might be glorious in making them happy. While we adore and rejoice in this descending love, and press forward to that perfect holiness which is intended for us; and while we reverence both the mystery of this sacred union with the Lord, as "members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones;" and his loving authority over us, who "nourisheth and cherisheth us, as a man doth his own flesh:—"let husbands hence learn how to love their wives, and to show themselves justly entitled to superiority, by wisdom, joined with tender sympathy and patient care; and let wives hence learn to obey and "reverence their husbands." If the original appointment of marriage, and the subject before us, were duly attended to, all harshness, tyranny, and unfaithfulness must be excluded: for "no man hateth his own flesh;" and on the other hand, all contests for superiority, and unreasonable attachment to humor and inclination, as interfering with cheerful obedience, would be prevented. In short, were Christianity general, and Christians more attentive to the precepts of their Lord; harmony and affectionate confidence would sweeten domestic life, without any material interruption or alloy. But as all are sinners, it behoves every individual to make many concessions and allowances, and to persevere in the duty of the relation, though attended with many a cross. Thus the worst evils will be prevented; and even an offending or unbelieving partner may be won upon: whereas, a retaliation of misconduct can only render disagreement perpetual, and resentment more deep and malignant, and so produce the most painful, disgraceful, and injurious consequences.

CHAP. VI.

The apostle exhorts children and parents to their respective duties, 1—4; and also servants and masters, 5—9. He animates his brethren to resist their spiritual enemies, by putting on and using diligently "the whole armor of God," 10—17, and by persevering prayer; supplicating for all saints, and for him especially, that he might preach the gospel with all boldness, 18—20. He commends Tychicus to them, and concludes with affectionate salutations, 21—24.

2 <sup>d</sup> Honor thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise;

4 And, <sup>f</sup> ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath; <sup>g</sup> but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

Note.—The apostle next exhorts believers, who had parents living, to be obedient to them, "in the Lord," for his sake, from gratitude to him, in obedience to his commands, and for the honor of his gospel. (Note, Col. 3:16, 17, v. 16.) The Lord Jesus seems especially intended. This general exhortation must be limited, according to the ages and particular circumstances of children. Some, it is probable, had Gentile parents; and they ought not to obey them, when their commands contradicted those of Christ: yet, it would be peculiarly incumbent on them, to give up their own will in all things lawful, for the credit of Christianity. The obedience of children to their parents, thus limited, is in itself "right," equitable, and reasonable, a debt due to the instruments of their existence, and the tender guardians of their infancy; and generally conducive to their good. (Marg. Ref. a-c.) Indeed, the sentiments of all nations coincide in this; and the law of God expressly commands children "to honor" the persons and authority of both father and mother, and to requite their kindness as they have opportunity and ability. This was placed in the decalogue, as "the first commandment" of the second table, being the first of the relative duties, and the source of all the others: and a promise of long life in the land of Canaan was annexed to it, as given to the Israelites, which might be generally applied to Christians, and encourage them to expect temporal comfort and length of days, as a gracious recompense for their obedience; unless the Lord should see good to reward it more liberally in another life. Indeed, it has been observed in every age, that those who have distinguished themselves by filial obedience, were remarkably prospered. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Gen. 9:20–23. Ex. 20:12. Lev. 19:3. Prov. 1:8. Matt. 15:3–6.)—The apostle also exhorted parents (for though fathers only are mentioned, doubtless mothers also were intended,) to use their authority without rigor; lest their children should be discouraged, prejudiced against Christianity, or provoked to obstinacy and disobedience; which would always prove painful to the parents, and often ruinous to the children. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Ex. 21:15–17. P. O. 12–36. Deut. 21:18–21. Prov. 29:17. 30:17.) The restraints, reproofs, and corrections of parents, ought therefore always to be used in a meek, affectionate, and forgiving disposition; while they diligently educate their children in such a manner, and with such instructions, as may best initiate them in the knowledge of Christ and true religion; and give them such friendly admonitions, as may guard them against the various snares of the world, and the temptations of Satan. (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Prov. 13:24. Col. 3:20,21.)—In these exhortations the inferior relation is constantly mentioned first; perhaps because the duty of it is most contrary to corrupt nature: yet it ought to be attended to, even when the superiors neglect theirs.—Instruct them in 'the principles of piety towards God, and faith 'in our Lord Jesus. ... Make them to read the 'scriptures, says Theophylact, which is the 'duty of all Christians: for is it not a shame to 'instruct them in heathen authors, whence they 'may learn bad things, and not to instruct them 'in the oracles of God?' Whitby. This is an important remark; but immensely more is required, in catechizing and otherwise instructing children, in reproof, mild correction, example, conversation, watchfulness against every thing in word or deed unbecoming in their presence, seizing every opportunity of drawing their attention to the great truths and duties of religion, and illustrating the effects of wickedness, the love of God, and the state of the world. Indeed immensely more, than can be even hinted at in a note, is implied in this brief exhortation.—Honor, &c. (2,3) From the LXX, omitting the latter clause, "the good land which the Lord thy God giveth unto thee."—It accords with the Hebrew. (Ex. 20:12.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle next exhorts servants, who had embraced Christianity, to be "obedient to their masters" "according to the flesh," that is, to whom they were subjected in temporal matters. In general, the servants at that time were slaves, the property of their masters; and were often treated with great severity, though seldom with that systematic cruelty which commonly attends slavery in these days. But the apostles were ministers of religion, not politicians: they had not that influence among rulers and legislators, which would have been requisite for the abolition of slavery. Indeed in that state of society as to other things, this would not have been expedient: God did not please miraculously to interpose in the case; and they were not required to exasperate their persecutors, by expressly contending against the lawfulness of slavery. Yet, both "the law of love," and the gospel of grace, tend to its abolition as far as they are known and regarded; and the universal prevalence of Christianity must annihilate slavery, with many other evils, which in the present state of things cannot wholly be avoided. 7:17—24.)—"In the wisdom of God," the apostles were left to take such matters as they found them, and to teach servants and masters their respective duties, in the performance of which the evil would be mitigated; till in due time it should be extirpated by Christian legislators.—Servants were therefore taught to "obey their masters," not only with a respectful attention to their persons and authority, and a fear of displeasing them; but with a jealous and trembling fear of offending and dishonoring God by an improper behavior. This was to be done, with a single desire and aim to do the will of "Christ," their great and gracious Master, whom they obeyed, in conscientiously serving even an unreasonable and tyrannical earthly master. (Marg. Ref. h—m.) They were also to do their work, of whatever kind, "not as eye-servants," who are diligent in their master's presence, and slothful in his absence, being only desirous of "pleasing man;" but as "the servants of God," who heartily did his will even in their secular employments. Then they would cheerfully and assiduously do service to their masters, as endeavoring "to please the Lord, and not men," in so doing; being assured, that whatever good action any man did, from Christian principles, it would be graciously recompensed by the Lord; and that a poor slave would be as much accepted, in performing the duty of his place, as any free man in his apparently more important services. (Marg. Ref. n—t.—Notes, Col. 3:22—25. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. Tit. 2:9,10. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) On the other hand, believing masters ought to act from the same principles, and in the same conscientious manner toward their servants, whether these were "Christians" or not: exercising their authority with humanity and gentleness; not only without inflicting rigorous punishments, as it was common for masters to do; but also forbearing to menace and terrify their servants; or to express any haughty or excessive anger at them, even when most evidently faulty. For though the laws of man gave them great power in this respect; yet they must remember, that they were accountable to the great Lord and Master of all for their use of it; who would deal with men, according to their conduct toward their inferiors, and who expects his people to copy the example of his lenity and mercy. Note.—The apostle here draws his practical instructions to a close, by a figurative exhortation, taken from military affairs. As the soldiers of Christ, the Ephesians were called to 'fight under his banner, against Satan, the 'world, and sin:' but they were too weak in themselves for this conflict; and must therefore "be strong in the Lord," by a continual reliance on his mighty power for protection, support, and assistance. (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, 2 Tim. 2:1,2.) In the fulness of Christ, and in the promised influences and assistance of the Holy Spirit, a "panoply," or complete suit of armor, was provided for every believer: this the Lord held out, as it were, to the Christians at Ephesus and all others, that, receiving it from him, by the prayers of faith, they might put it on daily, in a diligent and watchful use of the appointed means. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Note, Rom. 13:11—14.) Thus armed, they might be able "to stand against" the assaults of Satan, by whatever artful methods he or his instruments attempted to obstruct their progress. For they, and all Christians, were called to conflict and "wrestle," not only against their own in-dwelling corruptions, the opposition of persecutors, the enticements of wicked men, and the allurements of the world; but also against those invisible and formidable principalities and powers, who "ruled the darkness of this world;" even Satan and his angels, the great authors of man's ignorance, idolatry, delusion, impiety, and iniquity, all over the earth. These might be called "spiritual wickednesses in high places," not only as they held their empire in the air, according to the general opinion, (Note, 2:1,2.) and tempted men to wickedness, especially in their religion: but also as being the authors of all idolatry. Indeed they became proud rebels and apostates even "in heavenly places." Having been "spiritual wickednesses" in that holy world, they were cast out thence; and had from the beginning opposed man's entrance into heaven by every means, which malice, sagacity, and subtlety could suggest. (Marg. Ref. c-k.—Notes, 2 Pet. 2:4—9. Jude 5—8. Rev. 12:7—12.) It was therefore indispensably necessary for all, engaged in this warfare, to be completely armed for the conflict with such powerful and determined enemies; that they might "be able to stand in the evil day" of peculiar temptation or persecution, or at the approach of death. They must be prepared every day for the conflict, and would continually be called to resist their foes: but some days would peculiarly encourage or give advantage to Satan's assaults. They could not however know beforehand, when such occasions would be afforded him, and permission granted him: (Notes, Job 1:9—12. 2:6. Luke 22:31—34.) they must, as vigilant and valiant soldiers, be always ready; that thus, "withstanding in the evil day," and having done all, they might stand victorious on the field of battle, and be approved by their great Commander; as David, having conquered for himself and Israel, stood before the king with the head of Goliath in his hand. 17 And take <sup>u</sup> the helmet of salvation, and <sup>x</sup> the sword of the Spirit, <sup>y</sup> which is the word of God:

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The minds of Christian soldiers ought to be fortified, and prepared for the assault, by conscious sincerity in their profession, and by "truth" in their whole conversation; as the loins of soldiers were girded by their military belt, when they marched out to the battle. "Righteousness," or an habitual and conscientious obedience to the various commandments of God, should be their "breast-plate," which would defend them from fatal wounds in the day of conflict: whereas conscious negligence and disobedience would render them afraid to face persecution or death, in the cause of Christ. (Marg. Ref. o, p.) To stand their ground in difficult or slippery situations, or to march forward in rugged paths, "their feet must be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;" that is, their motives and encouragements to obedience, amidst temptations and persecutions, must be derived from a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the gospel; through which God is revealed as "in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," and actually at peace with every believer, notwithstanding past transgressions, and present defects and infirmities. (Notes, Rom. 5:1,2. 8:1,2.) This assurance would make obedience delightful, though self-denying; and animate the established believer to resist temptation, to endure tribulation, and to march through difficulties and enemies, in the cause of Christ and in the way to heaven. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, Deut. 33:25. Luke 15:22—24, v. 22.) Over all their other armor, "faith" must be placed as a "shield:" by crediting the testimony of God, realizing unseen objects, resting the soul on the promises, and relying on the power, truth, mercy, wisdom, grace, and providence of God, according to his word; they would be able to ward off the temptations of Satan; as soldiers received the spears or javelins of the enemy on their shields. (Notes, Heb. 11:1,2. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) The suggestions of the tempter would indeed often resemble "darts," by the suddenness and violence, with which they were injected, and "fiery darts," by the fatal effects produced by them. For, as poisoned darts would fatally inflame the blood of those wounded by them; and as firebrands thrown into a besieged city would at length effect a destructive conflagration, unless immediately extinguished; so the suggestions of Satan would inflame the anger, pride, sensual passions, avarice, or other corrupt propensities of the heart, unless immediately intercepted and quenched by "the shield of faith," resting on the promises and the truth, power, and mercy of God, to perform them. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Note, Gen. 39:8—10.)—This clause is often interpreted exclusively of those harassing temptations, by which hard thoughts of God, and horrid or desponding conclusions concerning themselves, are excited in men's minds. These lead to immense distress, and eventually to guilt; and faith in the promises of God must extinguish them: yet the apostle evidently meant the words in a more comprehensive sense.—To all this, "Hope," or a scriptural and prevailing and animating expectation of victory and eternal glory, must supply the place of "a helmet" to cover the head in the day of battle; by counteracting that discouragement, which doubtfulness of the event would induce, in times of sharp temptation: so that it might be called "the helmet of salvation," as nothing could be courageously done without it. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 1 Thes. 5:4—11. Heb. 6:16—20. 1 Pet. 1:13—16.) To complete the whole, the word of God must serve the Christian soldier for "a sword:" an exact and comprehensive acquaintance with its various doctrines, promises, precepts, warnings, and a readiness at re-collecting and adducing pertinent texts, upon every emergency, would drive the tempter to a distance, and procure a final victory over him. (Notes, Is. 59:16—19. Matt. 4:1—11.) Thus the whole suit of armor would be complete: for no covering was provided for the back; as victory must be sought by valor, not by cowardice.

Note.—To give all the rest their full efficacy; to procure, put on, and keep bright, this "whole armor of God;" the soldiers of Christ must

"pray always:" constantly, frequently, at stated times, in occasional ejaculations, and more abundantly in the prospect or in the hour of temptation; using all kinds "of prayer and supplication," in dependence on the Holy Spirit, and according to his teaching and influences; and "watching unto this very thing," guarding against all remissness, discouragement, weariness, interruptions, and unseasonable engagements; "with all perseverance;" (Notes, Matt. 26:40, 41. 1 Pet. 4:7.) seeing, Satan would peculiarly tempt them to negligence on this important concern, that he might obtain further advantages against them. (Marg. Ref. z—d.)—They must also remember to help one another, and "all the saints," by their prayers for them. Especially, the apostle entreated their prayers for him, that he might have opportunity, and liberty of spirit, boldly to declare his important message, in the face of danger and death: for, though he was Christ's ambassador of peace to the Gentiles, he was at that time executing his commission in confinement and in fetters; so greatly was his glorious Lord despised among men! (Notes, 3:1—7, v. 1. Acts 4:29—31. Phil. 1:12—14.) He, however, did not regard this degradation, or express any anxiety about his own liberty; provided he were enabled to speak with becoming boldness, firmness, and impartiality, when called to bear testimony to the truth. (Marg. Ref. e—m.—Note, Acts 4:29—31.)—Praying always, &c. (18) Notes, Luke 18:1—8. Phil. 4:5—7. 1 Thes. 5:16—22. 2 Tim. 1:3—5.—The reader, who is acquainted with what has been copiously written on this subject, will perceive, that, in a few particulars, the exposition here given of the Christian panoply rather varies from that of some approved writers. Zeal for particular doctrines often renders pious men too apt to explain every expression in support of them: though it weakens the general proof of them, makes one part of the scriptures coincide with the other by a needless repetition, and leaves out other matters equally important. Indeed, it may be apprehended, that by adducing every thing which can be thought of, in explaining metaphors, many things are supposed to be contained in them, which were entirely out of the writer's mind when he wrote them.—Bonds. (20) Or, "in a chain."—The apostle was allowed to live at Rome, with a soldier 'that kept him.—To this soldier he was tied 'with a chain, fixed on his right wrist, and fastened to the soldier's left arm; and the chain 'being of a convenient length, the two could 'walk together with ease. ... The soldiers, who 'were thus employed, no doubt reaped great 'benefit from the apostle's conversation and 'preaching.' Macknight. This is probable, and the thought is worthy of attention; but the words, 'no doubt,' imply more than we know on the subject.

Note.—The apostle knew, that the Ephesians would be anxious to be informed of many things concerning him: but it was not requisite for him to write on that subject, as he had sent with this epistle a brother and minister, competent to inform them, both how he did, and how he was employed, and to encourage and edify them by his converse and preaching. At the same time, he gave them his apostolical blessing, in such language, as showed that the grace, or special favor and mercy of God, would be on all them, and on them only, who "loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," and in an uncorrupt and holy manner. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The gospel furnishes believers with most efficacious motives to the cheerful performance of all relative duties: and the law directs those whom "Christ hath redeemed from its curse," in what manner they may "adorn his doctrine" and "show forth his praise:" for all its commandments are right and beneficial. (Notes, Rom. 7:9—12. Tit. 2:9, 10.)—When children "honor and obey their parents," they take a proper method to obtain temporal comfort and prosperity: and when they do it "in the Lord," from faith and love, it forms an evidence of their interest in his promises, which will be fulfilled in their everlasting felicity. Similar motives should induce parents, to attend diligently to the education of their children, with meekness, firmness, prudence, and affection; that they may "not provoke them to wrath" or tempt them to sin, but "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." But alas! how grievously is this duty neglected, even among those who are zealous for the great doctrines of the gospel! How many parents "seem to be religious," and are strict in some things; yet by their imprudence, violent passions, harshness, or unforgiving temper and conduct, disgust their children, prejudice them against religion, render them uncomfortable in their presence, and consequently induce them to prefer almost any other company! This does not indeed excuse the children's disobedience; but it awfully occasions it. On the other hand, how commonly do we see more regard paid to every kind of instruction, or trifling embellishment, than to the religious principles and conduct of young persons! So that too often the education given to children leads them to those habits, notions, or connexions, which make way for their subsequent ungodliness, infidelity, dissipation, licentiousness, or avarice; by which they ruin themselves, and propagate impiety, vice, and misery, in an accumulating progression. Those who fear God and love their children should watch and pray, even with trembling, that they may not thus prove the occasion of condemnation to their own offspring: for, though God alone can change the heart, yet he commonly does it, by the good instructions and example of parents, the means which they use for their children's spiritual good, and in answer to their fervent prayers. (Note, Gen. 18:18, 19.)—The grand maxim to be laid down, as most of all giving a scriptural ground to expect the blessing, is this: 'Decidedly "seek," 'for your children as well as yourselves, "first 'the kingdom of God, and his righteousness;" 'and steadily subordinate all regard to temporal 'advantage, and external accomplishment, and 'even proficiency in learning, to this great concern. 'Desire and aim "first of all," that your 'children may be true Christians; and form all

'your plans in entire subserviency to this main object.' Whereas they, whose chief anxiety seems to be, that their children may be wealthy, polite, learned, or accomplished, whatever be the event to their souls; or who suffer these things materially to influence their plan of education, and to interfere with their children being "brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," can have no scriptural ground to expect his blessing upon them.—Again, it is probable that but few masters will refuse their approbation to the injunctions here laid on their servants, or servants their approbation to the exhortations given to their masters; but alas! those who ought to obey the precept are exceedingly prone to object to it, or to explain it slightly. The greater advantages, however, servants now enjoy to what slaves of old did, or slaves in many countries now do, the more cheerfully should they yield obedience and perform service "to their own masters;" and the greater caution should they use not to dishonor the gospel by a negligent, refractory, contentious, or unfaithful behavior. They ought especially to avoid whatever may give plausibility to the imputation of their being "eye-servants, and men-pleasers:" but they should always act as in the fear of God, and with good-will do service to their masters, as unto the "Lord, and not unto men." This will engage the servants of Christ to diligence in their work, even if their earthly masters behave harshly and injuriously to them; and it will sanctify all their employments, and secure them a gracious recompense from the Lord himself. The same principles will render "masters" considerate, kind, gentle, and conscientious, in their whole deportment; "remembering that they also have a Master in heaven," who "is no Respector of persons." And, what orderly and happy families will those be, where relative duties are thus on all sides constantly and circumspectly attended to!

V. 10—17.

If we would serve the Lord in this evil world, we must depend on him for "strength," as well as for instruction, and a merciful acceptance. Our enemies indeed are mighty, and we "are without strength;" but our Redeemer is "almighty," and "in the power of his might" we may overcome all who oppose our course. Let us then daily "put on the armor," which "the Captain of our salvation" has prepared for us; that, being sober and vigilant, and always ready for the battle, we may be "able to stand against all the wiles of the devil." The potent rules of the darkness of this world, who wrought "spiritual wickedness" in heaven, will oppose our march to that inheritance which they have lost, and endeavor if possible to bring us to that hell to which they are condemned. They often have powerful allies in the principalities of the earth, and wicked men always fight under their banner: but our "flesh," the corrupt nature, the traitor in the camp, is our most dangerous foe; while fear of present suffering, and desires of present gratification, gain, honor, or distinction, continually war against our souls. We must therefore engage in this warfare as men in earnest, habitually expecting the onset of our foes, either by open violence or deeply laid stratagems. Some "fiery darts" will every day be thrown at us, to inflame our passions or distress our hearts but "evil days" of peculiar danger and difficulty must be expected; and we shall not be able to withstand in them, and, "having done all, to stand" as conquerors before our Captain, unless we be constantly armed for the fight. (Note, Luke 21:34—36. P. O. 20—38.) The soldier, who is secure in the enemy's country will probably be assaulted and shamefully wounded, when he least expects it. (Notes, 2 Sam. 11: Matt. 26:40—46, 69—75.) Habitual sincerity in professing and obeying the truth, and uprightness towards God and man, must be "the girdle of our loins," and the breastplate in this important warfare; but then "our feet must also be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace." In the constant exercise of vigorous faith and lively hope, we shall possess our impenetrable "shield," and our "helmet of salvation;" while with "the sword of the Spirit," even "the word of truth," we may drive our enemies before us, and seek the victory for ourselves and our fellow combatants. (Notes and P. O. Matt. 4: 1—11.)

If we would indeed "put on," and successfully use, "the whole armor of God;" we must likewise "pray always by the Spirit," with great earnestness and importunity, and "watch thereunto with all perseverance;" thus we shall be made "more than conquerors through him that loved us;" but in no other way.—We should also consider all the saints wherever they live, as fellow-soldiers in our spiritual warfare, though divided into different battalions, distinguishable by a few unimportant externals; and we must help them all with our supplications: for general success against the powers of darkness, the kingdom of Satan as well as personal victory, should be our noble ambition. But, all Christians are bound, in a peculiar manner to pray for the ministers of the gospel, as they are exposed to the special rage of the enemy: when they fall, it is "as when a standard-bearer fainteth," and their honorable conduct is of the greatest importance to the triumph of the gospel. Those ministers especially, who are exposed to great hardships and perils in their work, have particularly a claim to the prayers of their brethren. For "the ambassadors of peace," from the Lord to his rebellious creatures, have often been cast into prison and put to death as criminals.—It is peculiarly desirable, that "utterance should be given them" in perilous situations, that they may "boldly declare the mystery of the gospel;" for the more boldly they speak, in consistency with "the meekness of wisdom" and love, the better do they perform their work. Men of this stamp rather desire to "make full proof of their ministry," than to enjoy personal ease or liberty: their own affairs are inconsiderable in their judgment, compared with the success of the gospel. They, however, greatly rejoice to have beloved brethren and faithful ministers, who are able to comfort and establish the people in their absence: and, while they pray for peace, with faith and love, in behalf of all who profess the gospel, they must also remind them, that "grace will be with all them," and them only, "who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

PHILIPPIANS.

THE manner, in which the apostle and his associates were led to pass over from Asia into Europe, and to begin their labors at Philippi in Macedonia; as well as their success, and the persecution by which Paul and Silas were driven thence, have been already considered. (Notes, Acts 16:) The apostle had once afterwards visited Philippi, though few particulars are recorded. (Note, Acts 20:1—6.) As this epistle was manifestly written from Rome, and during the latter part of the apostle's first imprisonment in that city; nearly twelve years had passed since he first preached at Philippi: but the conduct of the Christians there had uniformly been so exemplary, and their grateful affection to him so fully evinced, that he had only to rejoice over them with heartfelt gratitude, while he poured out his prayers for them, and affectionately animated them to persevere and press forward in their heavenly course. Some cautions indeed, against deceivers of different descriptions, (Note, 3:17—19.) whose base conduct and awful doom he declares in most expressive terms, are joined with his exhortations. Not one censure, however, is passed or implied on any of the Philippians; but unqualified commendation and confidence. (Note, Rev. 2:8—11.) It is evident, that Epaphroditus, who had been sent with a supply of money to the apostle at Rome; and who seems to have been a pastor, and perhaps the principal pastor, of the church, conveyed the epistle to Philippi. He had, either by his journey to Rome, or by his zealous labors in assisting the apostle when in that city, brought a dangerous sickness upon himself; the tidings of which so afflicted the Philippians, and their sorrow when made known to Epaphroditus, so distressed him, that the apostle was induced to send him back sooner than he had intended, though to his own inconvenience. (Note, 2:24—30.)—The subjects treated on, and the instructions to be deduced from them, need not be anticipated. 'The apostle's design in this epistle (which is 'quite of the practical kind,' seems to be to comfort the Philippians under the concern they had expressed at the news of his imprisonment, to check a party spirit, that appears to have 'broke out among them, and to promote on the contrary an entire union and harmony of affection; to guard them against being seduced from the purity of the Christian faith, by Judaizing teachers; to support them under the trials with which they struggled; and above all, 'to inspire them with a concern to adorn their profession, by the most eminent attainments in 'the divine life.' Doddridge. It is undeniable, that the epistle was sent not long before the two years of the apostle's imprisonment at Rome were ended; which the Oxford Bible supposes to have taken place about the close of A. D. 65.—According to this I have dated the epistle, (though many fix an earlier date for it,) on a full conviction, that more years were spent in the various labors of this great apostle, than are generally supposed; yet, at the same time, not considering the subject as of great importance.

CHAP. I.

The apostle addresses the saints at Philippi with the bishops and deacons, 1, 2: showing his thankfulness to God for their "fellowship in the gospel," to that time; his love to them; and his confidence in them as to the future, 3—8; and giving a summary of the blessings for which he prayed in their behalf, 9—11. He informs them, that his imprisonment at Rome had conducted "to the furtherance of the gospel," 12, 13: so that many had been rendered more bold in preaching it, in which he greatly rejoices, though some did it from corrupt motives, 14—18; knowing that this "will turn to his salvation, through their prayers, and by the Spirit," and trusting that "Christ will be magnified in his body, whether by life or death," 19, 20. He declares that he is prepared for either event; that "to depart, and be with Christ, would be far better" for him; but that, as his life would be useful to them, he doubts in his choice, and supposes that he shall live, and be set at liberty, that he may further their joy of faith, by coming to them, 21—26. He exhorts them to walk worthy of their profession; to be of one mind "in striving for the gospel;" and to suffer cheerfully for Christ, as they had already been called to do, 27—30.

Note.—As Paul's apostleship had never been called in question at Philippi; and as he wrote this epistle, not only in his own name, but in that of Timothy, who was then at Rome with him; he styles himself and Timothy "the servants of Jesus Christ." (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, John 12:23—26. 13:12—17. Col. 3:22—25. Jam. 1:1. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.) He addressed himself to "the saints at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons:" hence we learn that the distinction between bishops and presbyters was not then generally established; but that the pastors of the church were distinguished from the deacons, who managed the secular matters and the charities of the church. (Marg. Ref.

d. g.—Notes, Acts 6:1—6. 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1—7.)—Much labor and learning have indeed been employed, to set aside this conclusion; but with little success, even by the allowance of decided episcopalians.—“Though it be generally resolved, that the word “bishop,” and “elder” are equivalent in scripture; yet this is not to be understood so, that either, or both of them, signifies indifferently those whom we now call presbyters; but that they both signify bishops, one settled in each church by the apostles; there being no use of the second order in the church, till the numbers of believers increased.” Hammond. Beyond doubt, the apostle ordained more than one, either bishops or presbyters, in some of the churches. (Acts 14:23. 20:17.) Indeed the address fully proves it as to “the bishops.” But this learned expositor did not perceive, that one bishop, without any presbyters under him, comes to precisely the same thing, as one presbyter, without any bishop over him. Till the churches were multiplied, the bishops and presbyters were the same: but afterwards, probably in the times of the apostles, the senior or more eminent presbyter, was called episcopus, or overseer, not of the church only, but also of its pastors.

Note.—The conversion and subsequent good conduct of the Philippians never occurred to the apostle’s mind, (and they would occur very frequently,) or were never mentioned to him, without animating him to thank God in their behalf; so that “always, in every prayer of his,” secret or social, he made requests for them with lively emotions of joy, which would greatly help to solace him in his confinement. He thanked “God for their fellowship in the gospel,” and its blessings, from the first day of their conversion to that present time, (which was about twelve years,) without having turned aside, or grown remiss in their profession. (Marg. Ref. i—n.—Note, 1 Cor. 1:4—9.) He was therefore “confident, that he,” even God the Spirit, who “had begun the good work” of sanctification in their souls, would carry it on, and perform it, till the perfection of their redemption, in body and soul, at the day of Christ. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, 9—11. Rom. 8:18—23. Eph. 1:13,14. 1 Thes. 5:23—28.)—Some learned men render the words, here translated “fellowship in the gospel,” “communication toward the gospel;” and understand them of the liberality which the Philippians had shown toward the apostle. (Note, 4:10—20.) But this, in itself, was a far inferior cause of gratitude to God, than the conversion of very many souls, to partake of all the blessings and salvation of Christ: the sentiment is not at all in the apostle’s manner in other epistles; or even in the other parts of the epistle, where he mentions that subject openly and perspicuously: the word here used more frequently means participation, than communication; and even when it has the latter meaning, it implies that the giver made the receiver his partner, or a sharer, with him in his abundance.

Note.—Many, who had made a credible profession of Christianity, afterwards became apostates, having “no root in themselves.” (Notes, Matt. 13:20,21. 1 Tim. 1:18—20. 2 Tim. 1:15. 2:14—18. 1 John 2:18,19.) Yet it was “meet” for the apostle to hope better things of the Philippians, and to be satisfied that a “good work” of new creation had indeed been wrought upon them. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) For their long continued consistency of conduct had given them a peculiar place in his heart; or, (as it may be rendered more obviously, and in equal consistency with the idiom of the language,) they had shown, that “they had him in their hearts,” and had abundantly evinced

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle next gave the Philippians a compendious account of his constant prayers for them. He was confident that they were true believers, and "loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity:" (Note, Eph. 6:21—24, v. 22.) and he therefore prayed, "that their love" of him, his cause, people, truths, and ordinances; of the holy character, law, and government of God; and of all men for his sake, might "abound more and more" in all its varied exercises and happy effects: (Notes, 1 Thes. 4:1—5, 9—12. 1 Pet. 1:22.) and that it might be regulated by an enlarged and exact "knowledge" of divine things; and by that sound judgment, which was the result of a holy relish for spiritual excellency, a matured discernment in the various parts of religion, and deep experience of its power in their hearts. For when these concurred, they enabled the Christian to judge, at once, in a variety of cases: even as the healthy eye distinguishes objects, the ear sounds, and the palate meats. (Marg. Ref. c, d.) Thus, false affections, unjustifiable measures, and enthusiasm would be excluded, and all those evils prevented, into which vehement zeal, without proportionable "knowledge and judgment," betrayed men, to the scandal of the gospel, and the division of the church: and their abundant love would be directed in forming and executing designs of extensive usefulness. (Notes, Eph. 5:15—20. Col. 1:9—14, v. 9, 10. 3:16, 17.) He further prayed, that they might be enabled to "distinguish things that differed," and to guard against counterfeit revelations, false affections, and all those specious errors and evils, by which Satan and his ministers imposed upon the unwary: thus they would choose and "approve things that were excellent," and reject others, however plausibly stated.—The marginal reading, "Try," or prove, "things which differ," is more exact than that inserted in the text: but it is evident, that "to distinguish things which differ," was especially intended. (Marg. and Ref.—Marg. Ref. e.) He also prayed, that they might be "sincere," not only as true believers, but as uncorrupted with base alloy, whether of false doctrine, superstition, or a worldly spirit and conduct. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) If the Philippians were thus "sincere," the apostle trusted, that, according to his prayers for them, they would be "without offence;" neither stumbling at the scandals laid in their way by others, nor misleading or grieving their brethren, or causing their neighbors to stumble at the word, by their misconduct; for both the active and passive sense may be implied. (Marg. Ref. f, g.)—Accordingly, he further prayed, that each of them might be thus upheld, till he should honorably finish his course; and even that the church of Philippi might be thus preserved, through successive generations, "untill the day of Christ:" and that the "trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord," might not only be in some measure fruitful; but that they might resemble those trees, which are laden with fruit on every bough, being "filled with all the fruits of righteousness," even holy tempers, all kinds of good works, "all the fruits of the Spirit," through every day of their future lives, in the full improvement of their talents, and according to the duties of their several relations. For these good fruits would not only be beneficial to men, and eventually advantageous to themselves; but, through Christ, as the effects of his grace, and accepted through his mediation, they would redound to the praise and honor of God; adorning and recommending the gospel, silencing gainsayers, and bringing sinners to glorify God, by the obedience and worship of faith. 14 And many of the <sup>o</sup> brethren in the Lord, <sup>p</sup> waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word <sup>q</sup> without fear.

Note.—It is probable, the apostle had been informed, that the Philippians feared lest his imprisonment should check the progress of the gospel, and intimidate others from preaching or embracing it: and no doubt Satan and his servants desired and expected this effect from it. He, however, would have his friends to know, that his sufferings had rather conduced to promote the cause of “Christianity,” through the interposition of God; and that the restraint put upon his personal ministry had been more than counterbalanced by other circumstances. So that “his bonds for Christ’s sake,” and his constancy in them, the doctrine for which he was imprisoned, and which he preached when a prisoner, had become openly known even in Nero’s palace among his courtiers, and in all other parts of Rome; which had excited a general attention to the gospel, through that immense city, whence the report would circulate almost throughout the earth. Moreover, many Christians, appointed to the ministry and qualified for it, who had before been timorous, perceiving how the apostle was protected, comforted, and prospered during his sufferings, were greatly emboldened to preach the gospel, without fear of persecution, in the most open, unreserved, and useful manner; by the labors of whom the knowledge of Christianity was rapidly diffused.

tion, <sup>u</sup> not sincerely, <sup>x</sup> supposing to add affliction to my bonds:

17 But the other of love, knowing that <sup>y</sup> I am set for the defence of the gospel.

18 <sup>z</sup> What then? Notwithstanding, every way, <sup>a</sup> whether in pretence, or in truth, <sup>b</sup> Christ is preached; <sup>c</sup> and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

Note.—While some, indeed, preached Christ out of “good-will to men,” and zeal for the cause of true religion; there were others, who were actuated by envy of the apostle’s reputation, success, or measure of liberty; and who aimed to cause divisions, even by preaching the gospel of peace! Probably these were Judaizers, who concealed part of their sentiments, and preached the substance of the gospel, in order to form a party under their influence, and in opposition to the apostle and his friends; that so they might gradually impose the Mosaic law on the Gentile converts. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) The designing, ambitious, and selfish conduct of these men, proved that they were insincere in what they preached, and that they only wanted to excite contentions; which would not only add affliction to the apostle’s mind, during his imprisonment, but, as they supposed, would also increase the virulence of his persecutors.—Others, however, acted from love to him, for the sake of Christ: knowing that he was appointed, as the apostle of the Gentiles, to defend, as a bulwark, the pure gospel, against all who opposed or perverted it: and that he was now lodged in prison in the metropolis; not only as a witness for the truth, concerning justification and Christian liberty, against Judaizers, but also to bear testimony before senators, prætors, and courtiers, nay, perhaps before the emperor himself, concerning the holy doctrine of salvation through Christ Jesus. But, though some aimed to oppose, grieve, or injure him, even by preaching the gospel; yet, as Christ was preached by that means, either in a professed or a sincere zeal for his honor, among great numbers who had hitherto been strangers to the gospel, and who might in due time be more fully instructed in the faith; the apostle rejoiced, and he determined to do so, whatever consequences might ensue to himself. (Marg. Ref. u—c.) ‘Not indeed with a pure mind, though otherwise their doctrine was pure.’ Beza. It is not certain who these preachers were; or whether they meant to excite divisions between the Jewish and Gentile converts, or to stir up the persecuting rage of idolaters against the apostle, for boldly propagating a doctrine subversive of idolatry; or that of the emperor and statesmen against him, for “preaching another King, one Jesus.” But the whole tenor of his writings and conduct shows, that if the doctrines which they taught had been materially erroneous, he would have opposed them, instead of rejoicing

19 For <sup>d</sup>I know that this shall turn to my salvation, <sup>e</sup>through your prayer, and the supply of <sup>f</sup>the Spirit of Jesus Christ,

20 According to my <sup>g</sup>earnest expectation, and my hope, that <sup>h</sup>in nothing I shall be ashamed, but <sup>i</sup>that with all boldness, as always, so now also <sup>k</sup>Christ shall be magnified in my body <sup>l</sup>whether it be by life or by death. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle knew, that these afflictive dispensations, however aggravated, would help forward his final salvation, through the prayers of his brethren, and the communication of “the Spirit of Christ” to his soul, to promote his humility, spirituality, and meekness for heaven. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 1:8—11. 4:13—18.) This satisfied him, as to his personal concern; for he was willing to endure any abasement or suffering, which might conduce to the honor of Christ. And indeed he earnestly expected a happy event of his trials; as one who, with outstretched neck, eagerly looks for the coming of some beloved friend: and he confidently hoped, that he should not be made ashamed in any thing, by the disappointment of his expectations or endeavors: but that as, in all former instances, he had boldly and successfully stood his ground; in this present case also, he should be strengthened, and inspired with courage, that Christ might be magnified in and by his frail body; whether his life were spared that he might again labor in spreading the gospel, or whether he should be called to shed his blood in confirmation of his testimony. (Marg. Ref. f—l.—Notes, Rom. 6:12—19. 8:28—31.)—Salvation. (19) The connexion between “salvation,” and “the supply of the Spirit of Christ,” fully proves, that eternal salvation and not temporal deliverance was meant. (Note, Rom. 3:11—14.)

The supply. (19) Επιχορηγίας. See on Eph. 4:16.—My earnest expectation. (20) Την αποκραυδοειαν ... με. See on Rom. 8:19.

21 For to me <sup>m</sup>to live is Christ, and <sup>n</sup>to die is gain.

23 For I am <sup>r</sup>in a strait betwixt two, having <sup>s</sup>a desire to depart, and to be <sup>t</sup>with Christ, which is <sup>u</sup>far better:

25 And having this <sup>y</sup>confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all, <sup>z</sup>for your furtherance and <sup>a</sup>joy of faith;

26 That <sup>b</sup>your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again.

Note.—With peculiar animation, the apostle here declared the happy frame of his mind, in his perilous situation. As Christ was the Author and Support of his spiritual life, so was he the End and Object of his life on earth. (Notes, John 14:4—6. Gal. 2:17—21. Col. 3:1—4.) He had no other business, interest, honor, or pleasure, for which “to live,” but Christ, and his glory, service, and favor: and therefore he knew that “to die” would be his greatest gain. For he should then be enabled more perfectly to know, love, serve, and enjoy the favor of his gracious Lord; and have done with sin, temptation, and suffering for ever. Yet, if he continued “to live in the flesh,” and to endure hardship a little longer, this would be “the fruit of his labor,” and “worth his while:” as his labor would be fruitful of good to himself, as well as to others. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) So that he knew not which he should choose, if it were left to him; being “in a strait between two,” and drawn both ways, by the reasons which he had to desire life on the one hand, and death on the other. Indeed, he had a strong desire “to depart” from this world of sin and sorrow, that he might immediately go and be with Christ; exchanging the life of faith, hope, and feeble love, for that of sight, fruition, and perfect holiness: as this was incomparably better, as to himself personally, than any thing which could be possessed or enjoyed on earth. Nevertheless, his continuance here was the more needful, for the benefit of his beloved people; and he was willing to postpone the completion of his own happiness for their comfort and advantage. (Marg. Ref. o—x.) Indeed having this confidence respecting his own concerns, he was also assured by intimations from the Lord, that he should abide some time longer, to promote their growth and establishment in the faith, and the joy or glorying in God connected with it; and that, being permitted to come and renew his labors among them, he should be an instrument of increasing their abundant rejoicing in Christ. (Marg. Ref. y—b.—Note, 2 Cor. 1:23,24.)—“Christ is gain to me living and dying,” (21). Thus Beza and many others, translate and understand the words: but the antithesis between the two parts of the verse is thus destroyed: the meaning is comparatively cold, nay selfish; and, though I would speak diffidently, after such eminently learned critics, the original seems incapable of this construction.—‘The original is the highest superlative, which it is possible to form in any language.’ Macknight. ‘Better beyond all comparison and expression.’ Doddridge.—‘Could St. Paul think a state of insensibility much better than a life tending so much, as his did, to the glory of God, to the propagation of the gospel, and to the furtherance of the joy of Christians?’ Whitby.—The doctrine of the soul’s immediate happiness, with Christ in glory, is here declared, beyond almost the possibility of doubt, except as men disbelieve the apostle’s testimony. Note.—None of the events before referred to, nor any other, could harm the Christians at Philippi; if they “only” took heed to have “their conversation becoming the gospel,” which they had embraced. (Note, Eph. 4:1—6.) The original word, rendered “conversation,” denotes the conduct of citizens, when it accords to their privileges, and tends to the credit, safety, peace, and prosperity of the city. Thus having been most graciously made citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, they ought to act suitably to that high character, and to seek the honor of the gospel, and the welfare of the church, in all their actions. Then it would be well with them, and gladden the apostle’s heart, “whether he came to see them,” or only “heard of their affairs;” that they stood firm in the profession of the faith, and in obedience to Christ, amidst surrounding temptations, and bad examples; avoiding all dissensions; continuing as one body actuated by one spirit; being of one heart and mind, in the great concerns of religion; not striving one against another, either about their temporal interests or reputation, or about any things of subordinate importance in religion, in which they did not exactly agree; but, as one compact phalanx, striving with united force against the common enemy, to exclude false teachers, to prevent evils and errors, to bear up under persecution, and by every means to promote the grand cause of Christianity. (Marg. Ref. c—i.) In attending to these things, they ought in no wise to be intimidated by the number, power, menaces, or cruelties of their adversaries; whose malignant rage against such excellent persons proved them enemies to God and holiness, who were in the way of perdition: while the meek and patient conduct of those who suffered for Christ’s sake, united to the holiness of their characters, was an additional evidence that they were the friends of God, and “partakers of salvation,” “even that of God,” which he had planned, effected, revealed, and conferred, nay, wrought in the hearts of his people. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) For indeed they were called to an additional honor and privilege; in that “it was given to them, not only to believe” in Christ for salvation, but to be distinguished among his disciples by a nearer conformity to him in suffering, for which their reward would be great in heaven. (Note, Matt. 5:10—12.) For they were then enduring the same honorable conflict, which they had seen the apostle engaged in, when scourged and imprisoned at Philippi; and which they heard, that he was at that time sustaining, by his imprisonment at Rome. (Marg. Ref. o—s.—Notes, Acts 16:19—24. 21:27—40. 25:1—12. 28:16—31.)—Many expositors are very exact, in this and other passages, in distinguishing between the persecutions, which the apostle and the churches were exposed to from the Jews, and those which they endured from the Gentiles. But this rather embarrasses, than clears, the interpretation; and the practical instruction, if not thus lost sight of, is the same in either case. No doubt, the Jews excited most of the persecutions, to which the apostle was exposed; and his zeal for the admission of the Gentiles into the church, without circumcision, or regard to the ritual law, rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to them. But it is also evident, that zeal for idolatry and for local cus-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Those servants of Christ, who most resemble their Lord, will cordially “thank God, on every remembrance” of the congregations, among whom they have labored; when they know that ministers and people, in their proper places, attend to their several duties, in such a manner, as evinces them to have “fellowship with Christ,” and to share the blessings of his gospel. (Note, 1 John 1:3,4.) But alas! how often are faithful pastors constrained to make requests “with tears,” instead of “with joy,” for those in whom they once were confident, but for whom they now tremble! We may, however, be always confident, that God “will perform his good work” in every soul, in which he has really begun it by regeneration: though we should warn men not to trust in superficial appearances, sudden emotions, external reformation, change of seat or sentiment, or in any thing short of “a new creation” unto holiness. But, it is “meet for us to hope” the best of those who profess the truth, and do not disgrace it; and greatly to desire the spiritual welfare of those, who have showed us kindness for the Lord’s sake, sympathized in our sorrows, and helped us in our “labors for the defence and confirmation of the gospel;” as we may well conclude, that they are really partakers of divine grace. We should “long after them in the bowels of Jesus Christ;” and pour out our prayers for them, especially when incapable of doing them other service.—We cannot in general pray for ourselves, and in behalf of those who possess that “faith which worketh by love,” in a better manner, than by copying the example before us; and requesting that “our love may abound yet more and more,” and be exercised “in knowledge and in all judgment;” that we and they may “discern between things that differ,” and know how to choose the good and refuse the evil; that we may be sincere and diligent disciples; preserved from all scandals and offences, and “filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are through Christ, to the praise and glory of God.” For those things, which most honor God, will eventually most benefit us: we should not therefore leave it dubious, whether any good fruit be found on us, or not; a small measure of love, knowledge, judgment, spirituality, and fruitfulness, should not satisfy us: but we ought to long, and pray without ceasing, and use every appointed means with diligence and earnestness, that we may be “filled with all the fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God;” as aiming at great things, and nobly aspiring to do much good, and to be “holy as God is holy.”

V. 12—20.

The consideration, that the Lord “worketh all things after the counsel of his own will,” should reconcile us even to those afflictive dispensations, which seem to preclude us from usefulness. Whatever Satan or wicked men may intend or expect, our God can further the success of his gospel, by the very events which arise from men’s endeavors to stop its progress. He often works by apparent contraries: and his most able ministers have been immured in prisons; that their “bonds in Christ” might bring the knowledge of his truth into the courts of justice, nay, even into the palaces of princes; (Notes, Matt. 10:16—18. Mark 13:9—13.) and the blood of the martyrs has more abundantly made fruitful the good seed of the word of God. Nay, the extremest sufferings and cruel death of his saints, instead of intimidating, have infused courage into their brethren, while they witnessed the triumphant consolations of the happy sufferers. Indeed, Satan will endeavor to prevent these blessed effects, even by stirring up men to “preach the gospel” from unworthy motives: and not only have ambition and avarice moved immense numbers to take this sacred office upon them; but envy, malice, and contention have done the same: and Christ and his truth have often been preached, in order to grieve, perplex, or expose to enmity and persecution his faithful suffering servants! So varied are the effects of human depravity! We should indeed grieve to see “tares sown in the Lord’s field,” and the souls of men deceived by “damnable heresies;” but when the substance of the truth is preached among ignorant persons, we should neither so much regard our own reputation, or that of our party, nor be so concerned about the motives of the persons employed, as not to rejoice, if even by such means sinners are brought acquainted with the all gracious Saviour. (Note, Mark 9:38—40.) The painful and vexatious circumstances, which sometimes attend these transactions, will “turn to our salvation,” if we bear them in a proper manner; through “the supply of the Spirit of Christ,” granted in answer to the prayers made for us and by us. Our “earnest expectation and hope” should be, not to be honored by men, or to escape the cross; but to be so upheld amidst contempt and affliction, that we may not be put to shame, or disgrace the cause of God; and that we may act with such boldness and constancy, amidst dangers and enemies, that “Christ may be magnified in our bodies,” whether by our laborious services and protracted sufferings, or by the honorable conclusion of our work and warfare. (Notes, Rom. 6:12,13,16—19. 12:1 1 Cor. 6:18—20.)

V. 21—30.

We are most of us very far from having made that progress in the divine life which holy Paul had; yet, if true believers, we habitually consider Christ as "our Life." Our main interest, work, honor, and comfort in this world are centred in him; and his glory is the great end, to which we would direct all our conduct. In proportion to the depth of our experience in this respect, should be our well grounded assurance, that to "die will be our gain." If we have this earnest of our inheritance, death can take us away from nothing but what is vain, vexatious, defiling, ensnaring, and utterly insufficient for our felicity: and it will convey us to the fountain-head of those holy joys, which here we relished, and from time to time had tastes of, but were never able to participate without alloy or interruption: and what a blessedness must that be, which can render death the richest gain, and make us long earnestly for the approach of "the king of terrors," as the messenger of our Father, to put us in possession of our eternal inheritance!—How cold and heartless, compared with this, are philosophy's applauded antidotes against the fear of death! We cannot read even Cicero on this subject, without feeling that his vigorous genius languishes for want of interesting topics; and that he at last advances nothing which can at all satisfy the mind, in the prospect of dissolution and of an unexplored eternal state. We should, however, be willing to live in this evil world, if the Lord see good: this will retard, but it will also increase, our complete felicity, if our days be spent in diligent labors, and patient sufferings for Christ's sake. We need not wish to choose in this respect; for we should not know what choice to make. It is blessed indeed to be in that "strait between two," which the apostle described: to "have a longing desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better;" and yet to be willing to abide in the flesh, in order, if the Lord pleases, to be helpful to the faith and holy joy of our brethren: and indeed it is well worth while living for years in pain and suffering, if by that means we may promote the cause, for which Christ shed his blood upon the cross. Yet, it can hardly be expected, that all believers should be found thus superior to the love of life, and the fear of death; and thus willing to live and suffer, from love to their brethren, when assured of their own salvation. Nor should we "despise the day of small things," either in ourselves or others; though we should press forward to this full assurance of hope, this fervor of longing grateful love, and this entire submission to the Lord's will. But nothing can harm us, if we "only let our conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ." In that case, all changes, personal or relative, in the church or in the world, "will work together for our good." This then should be our primary personal concern: and all the company of believers, however divided and subdivided, should consider themselves as one great army; and endeavor to "stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel;" and to recommend the salvation of Christ to all around them, and diffuse the knowledge of it to "every creature under heaven," as far as possible. In such a cause, we should not allow ourselves to be "terrified by any adversaries;" for their reproaches and menaces against those who thus serve Christ, are a manifest proof, that they are in the broad road to destruction, as they hate the truth and image of God in his people. This enmity of ungodly men against us, for Christ's sake, when we love and are beloved by the brethren; is "an evident token" to us, that we partake of salvation by the grace of God; as both friends and foes discern his seal upon us: and to us "it is given, in the behalf of Christ," to believe the same truths, to love and suffer in the same holy cause, and to endure the same conflict, which prophets, apostles, and martyrs have maintained before us.

CHAP. II.

The apostle, by the most affecting topics, exhorts his brethren to humble, condescending, and self-denying love, 1—5; after the example of Christ, in his incarnation, humiliation, and death on the cross, as introductory to his glorious exaltation, 5—11. He exhorts to diligence, "in working out their own salvation," as depending on the grace of God, 12, 13; and to profess the gospel, and adorn it among their neighbors, by a harmless and blameless example, in such a manner, that he might rejoice with them at the day of Christ, in the success of his labors, 14—16. He assures them that he should joyfully become a martyr for their sakes; and exhorts them to rejoice with him, 17, 18. He hopes to send Timothy to them shortly, whom he highly commends, 19—23; as he does also Epaphroditus, their messenger to him; who had been sick, and was grieved that they had heard of it, and who, as God had mercifully restored him, longed to return to them, 24—27. The apostle therefore sends him back, and exhorts them highly to value him and such as he, seeing he had "disregarded his life, to supply their lack of service," 28—30.

Note.—(Notes, 1:27—30. Eph. 4:1—6.) The apostle evidently deemed harmony among Christians essential to "a conversation becoming the gospel." He therefore speaks to this effect: "By all the consolation and animating 'motives derived from Christ; from the pardon 'of your sins and your deliverance from "the 'slavery of sin and Satan," from the love of 'Christ and communion with him, from the fellowship of the sanctifying Spirit, from the fa-

(Marg. Ref. a.—) "If any force of 'exhortation, in ... the name of Christ.' Whitby. The original word signifies exhortation, as well as consolation, or rather an encouraging and animating exhortation. The authority of Christ, speaking by his apostle, as well as the consolation derived from him, seems implied. (Marg. Ref. a.)—The expressions which follow are varied, to include all that can be imagined, in the most cordial amity, unity, and sympathy. Let them live together as members of one body animated by one soul; (Notes, 1 Cor. 12:12—26. 13:4—7.) let their common love to Christ, and delight in his holy service, unite them in love to each other; let them be "of one accord" in every undertaking to promote the common cause; and let them seek, in behalf of themselves and each other, that degree of spiritual illumination, which might make them of "one judgment," and of the same sentiments as much as possible. (Note, 1 Cor. 1:4—9.) But, as differences in some things might take place; and even in conducting the concerns of the church, some would judge more favorably of persons or measures than others; of which Satan would take advantage, in order to disturb their harmony: let them all watch themselves and each other, that they did nothing from self-will, a contentious temper, or an ambitious desire of obtaining applause, influence, or superiority. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Gal. 5:22—26. Jam. 3:13—18.) On the other hand, let them see to it, that they were actuated by a humble spirit, and that, from a consciousness of the evils in their heart and conduct, which others could not observe, and from candor to their brethren, they were ever ready to deem others more deserving esteem than themselves. In many cases this could not be done, in respect of talents or spiritual gifts, though self-flattery and vain glory in these things also would readily and dangerously intrude: but if the endowments, and the obligations connected with them, were properly estimated, they would rather conduce to humble than to exalt them; even as the apostle spake of his knowledge in the mystery of Christ, when he deemed himself less than the least of all saints. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Rom. 12:3—8. Eph. 3:1—8.) They ought not, therefore, to regard either their own attainments, or interests, or credit, or inclinations, alone or principally; but in humble self-denying love, to recede from every personal concern, for the benefit of the brethren, and the peace of the church.—'Be as ready to assist and help others, 'as if you were their subjects and inferiors: so 'the example of Christ requires, and so the 'precept runs; that he who is the greatest 'should be the servant to others.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. l.—Notes, Matt. 20:24—28.)

Note.—To illustrate and enforce, in the most effectual manner, that conduct which he had recommended, the apostle here called on Christians, to cultivate and manifest the same mind, judgment, and disposition, which had been so conspicuous in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. m.—Note, Rom. 8:5—9.) He had been "in the form of God;" he appeared in divine majesty and glory, as the Creator and Lord of all, in the heaven of heavens, and all the angels worshipped him as God, One with and coequal to the Father. He had manifested himself, as JEHOVAH, to patriarchs, prophets, and the church of Israel, through successive ages; and had not thought it "a robbery to be equal with God," and to receive divine adoration from men. To this he was conscious of having a full right, without in the least interfering with the honor due to the eternal Father. Nevertheless, he "emptied," or impoverished himself. He divested himself of his divine glory, that he might appear on earth, like one of no dignity or reputation; as princes sometimes travel without the insignia of royalty, and are not known from private persons. He did not come down from heaven "in the form of God," as when he gave the law from mount Sinai; he appeared not like himself, "the Lord of Glory," but "in the form of a servant," even of the lowest servant. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) As he was really "a Servant" to the Father, when in "the form of a servant," so was he really God when "in the form of God." By this voluntary susception of a new character, in order to man's salvation, "he was made in the likeness of men;" he assumed our nature, and became "like us in all things but sin." (Marg. Ref. r. — Notes, Rom. 8:1,2. Gal. 4:4—7, v. 4. Heb. 2:5—18.) Thus the Only begotten of the Father tabernacled here on earth "in fashion as a man," being truly Man, but more than man at the same time: (Notes, John 1:1—14.) and he was pleased still more to abase himself, by submitting to the most indigent circumstances, and the most accumulated hardships for our salvation: especially "he became obedient" to the whole divine law, as our Surety, and "fulfilled all righteousness," amidst inconceivable difficulties and temptations. In this he persevered to the end: and, his voluntary obligations requiring it of him, he submitted to suffer death, even that of crucifixion, the most ignominious, tormenting, and accursed kind of execution, to which the vilest of malefactors were condemned; and he was most perfectly resigned and obedient to the Father, through all the inward agony, and multiplied indignities and cruelties, which he endured. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) Thus low he voluntarily stooped, from that "glory which he had with the Father before the world was." (Note, John 17:4,5.) He not only abased himself to become man; but he denied and humbled himself as man, to the very depth of suffering and shame; from love to rebels and enemies who justly deserved to perish! (Note, 2 Cor. 8:9.) The example can never be done justice to by human language; and all our imitation of such immense condescension, compassion, self-abasement, self-denial, and liberal, laborious, forgiving, patient, suffering love, must necessarily fall infinitely short of it. In this view of the subject, how important and energetic is the apostle's argument! How striking is the illustration!—But Socinians and others have labored to prove, that the apostle only meant, that 'the Man Jesus, though he acted as the Ambassador and Representative of God, did not think of robbing him of his glory, by claiming equality 'with God! Now, this would sink the meaning, not only into insipidity, but absurdity: for it would propose as an example of the most perfect love, self-denial and humility, a bare exemption from the most horrible impiety and ambition imaginable! as certainly it must be such, for a mere creature, in any possible circumstances, to harbor a thought of aspiring to equality in honor and majesty with the infinite God. Indeed this sense cannot be consistent with our Lord's frequent and most express declarations concerning himself. (John 5:17,18, 23. 8:58. 10:30—33. 14:9,10.) Nay, the whole interpretation of the passage must be forced and unnatural: the reality of our Lord's human nature, "in the likeness of man," and "in fashion as a man," might as justly be questioned, as the reality of his Deity, who "was in the form of God:" and his "taking upon him the form of a servant," and "becoming obedient," are unmeaning words upon the Socinian interpretation, but exceedingly emphatical upon that before proposed.—On a portion of scripture which is of so great importance, both in respect of its general import, and also in the argument concerning our Lord's Deity; and which, at the same time, has been perplexed by discordant interpretations, more than most other passages; something additional may be properly adduced. 'Who does not perceive, 'that Paul declares what Christ was, before he 'assumed "the form of a servant?" ... Christ 'himself when he was God, and consequently 'in that glory and majesty which belong to God 'alone; and when he did not think, that he 'usurped any thing not belonging to him; yet, as 'laying aside this glory, abased himself even so 'far, as to become such as the servants of God 'are, that is, to "become man:" yea, and then 'also he conducted himself towards the Father, 'not as towards his equal, but his Lord; so that 'he voluntarily submitted to undergo the most 'ignominious death! And shall not we, mortal 'and mean slaves, be ashamed of our arrogance, 'in acting as if we excelled our brethren? This, 'I say, is Paul's argument, than which nothing 'can be more weighty and forcible. ... "He 'thought it no robbery." Or, as a most learned interpreter renders it, "He did not think it 'a prey to be seized on." For he refers that 'which follows to the manifestation made in the 'flesh; that this should be the meaning:— 'Christ, as God, possessed of eternal glory and 'majesty, knew indeed that it was just and lawful for him to appear, not in humble flesh, but 'with a dignity worthy of God: but he chose 'rather to abase himself. ... But, I think that 'this also belongs to the pristine glory of Christ, 'which he mentions, John 17:5. and that this 'is the meaning: Christ, when possessed of 'that eternal glory of Deity, was not ignorant, 'that in this thing, (that is, in being coequal 'with God the Father,) he did no injury to any 'one, but used his own right: nevertheless he, 'as it were, receded from his right, when he 'reduced himself even to nothing, by "taking 'on him the form of a servant." 'Beza.—The word, rendered robbery, is not found in any other place in the New Testament, and but very seldom in other writers; yet the derivation of it fixes it to the meaning given to it in our translation. The word, rendered equal, is ισα, not ισορ; and many have argued from this circumstance, that similitude, not equality is meant; but the learned bishop Pearson has shown, that ισα, especially used with εωα, may express equality as well as ισορ.—Socinus inquires, 'How can God be said to be equal to 'himself? To this, it may be answered, that the Son may be equal to the Father, in the unity of the Godhead, which is all that the apostle's language implies, and all that Trinitarians contend for: nor can this be denied, without begging the question, and denying that there is any distinction of Persons in the unity of the Godhead.—He emptied himself, taking the ‘form of a servant; being made in the likeness of men.’ Thus bishop Pearson literally translates the seventh verse.—If any man doubt how Christ “emptied himself,” the text will satisfy him; By “taking on him the form of a servant:” and if any still question, how he “took on him the form of a servant,” he has the apostle’s answer; By “being made in the likeness of men.”—Here it may be observed, that if Christ had originally been a creature of God, he must have also been his servant, before his incarnation: and this is conclusive against the Arians, as well as the Socinians.—So afterwards, “Being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.” As therefore his humiliation consisted in his obedience unto death; so his emptying himself, consisted in “taking on him the form of a servant,” and that in the nature of man. The clauses are connected in the original, not by way of conjunction, in which there might be some diversity; but by way of opposition, which signifies a clear identity. The grand point, in order to understand the passage, is this, to determine in what sense Christ “was in the form of God,” and how “he emptied himself:” and the above remarks, suggested by bishop Pearson’s learned and able disquisitions on the passage, and sometimes in his words, give, as it appears to me, the most complete satisfaction. (Note, Matt. 17:1,2.)—The passage indeed is full to the point, as to our Lord’s Deity; and all, who oppose this construction of it, are evidently baffled in the argument: so that after all their efforts, it stands unmoved, as the deep rooted rocks amidst the raging billows. But had some deeper impression been made on it, the Bible would still afford the humble believer abundant proof of this “great Mystery of godliness,” on which every well-grounded human hope must be established. 10 That at the name of Jesus a every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things b under the earth; 11 And that c every tongue should confess, that Jesus Christ d is Lord, e to the glory of God the Father.

[Practical Observations.]
Note.—When the eternal Word, “the Son of God,” had fulfilled his engagements as our incarnate Surety; God the Father “most highly exalted him,” in our nature, by advancing him to the mediatorial throne. For the two circumstances, that it is Christ, as Man, who is thus exalted, and that he is exalted as Mediator, renders this perfectly consistent with his external glory and dominion, as “God over all, blessed for evermore.” (Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, John 5:20—23.) The absolute kingdom of the Creator; and the mediatorial kingdom of the Redeemer, established for the benefit and salvation of rebels against the Creator, who are condemned by his law, must be distinguished. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—23.) It was, in consequence of the engagements of the eternal Son, that the reign of mercy was introduced. (Note, John 1:17.) For this “joy set before him, he endured the cross, &c.” (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) Nothing could be deducted from his authority, as God, nor any thing added to it: but it did not consist with the honor of the divine law and justice, to deal with men, except through a Mediator, who was One with the Father; and One with them, their Surety, Sacrifice, and Intercessor. The mediatorial kingdom alone was “given” to Christ, and given to him as Man: but had he not been God also, and possessed of all divine perfections, how could he possibly have administered it? (Note, Matt. 28:18.) Thus God the Father “gave him a name,” and a degree of honor and authority, above that of every other name; so that no created being ever was or could be so honored, as he was, who had been “the Man of sorrows;” and was crucified between two thieves! (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, Eph. 1:9—12,15—23.) Insomuch that “at the name of Jesus,” the name given to a poor Babe, born in a stable, and laid in the manger, (because that Babe was Emmanuel, “God with us,” that Child born, that Son given, was the “mighty God,”) “every knee should bow,” in submission and adoration. (Notes, Matt. 1:20—23. Luke 2:8—14. Rev. 5:11—14.) That is, all rational creatures should either willingly adore him; or be punished as the enemies of God and his kingdom. This includes angels and saints in heaven, men on earth, the bodies of the dead who are under the earth, the souls of the wicked in a separate state; and indeed all the principalities and powers of darkness. In short, “every tongue shall confess,” every creature must, one way or another, acknowledge, “that Jesus Christ is Lord,” the Lord of all, “the Lord of glory,” yea, JEHOVAH the Saviour: and this will be so far from interfering with the honor of God the Father, (as Anti-trinitarians object,) that it will be to his glory. For "He and the Father are One;" and the whole Deity is more displayed and glorified, in the Person and Redemption of Christ, before the whole universe, than by all other divine operations and discoveries: so that all the honor and worship which is rendered to the Person of the Son, as "God manifest in the flesh," is virtually rendered to the Godhead, through the medium of his humanity, by which alone sinners can know, approach, or worship the infinite God. 13 For it is <sup>l</sup> God which worketh in you both <sup>m</sup> to will and to do of his <sup>n</sup> good pleasure.

Note.—As the Philippians, whom the apostle addressed in the language of cordial love, had so endearing and encouraging an example set before their eyes; let them persevere in copying it as they had hitherto done. They had always been prompt "to obey" the will of Christ, made known by his apostle, not merely while he abode among them, but even with increasing attention after he had left them: and he greatly desired and earnestly exhorted them, that they should now, in his absence, labor diligently in all the means of grace, and in the performance of every duty, to obtain more complete deliverance from the power of sin, by the renewal of their souls to holiness. Thus they should "work out their own salvation with fear and trembling," lest any of them "should seem to come short of the promised rest," and be proved to "have no root in themselves," by "falling away in the hour of temptation;" lest by negligence they should lose their comfort, and subject themselves to darkness and terror at the approach of death; or lest they should dishonor God, and prejudice men against the gospel, by falling into scandalous sins. (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Heb. 4:1,2. 12:15—17.)—"The phrase, ("with fear and trembling,") in other places of these books, seems 'to imply, ... not only lowliness of mind; but diligence, and caution, and solicitude, and fear 'of displeasing.' Hammond. (Marg. Ref. k.)—"Though we are freely saved in Christ alone,

'apprehended by faith: yet we must press forward unto salvation in the way of righteousness; seeing that the sons of God are led by 'the Spirit of him by whom they are justified, 'that they may walk in good works.' Beza.—"Salvation" here signifies, not justification, either exclusively or primarily; but deliverance from sin and all its consequences; which must be, and will be, diligently and vigilantly labored for by all the regenerate, as long as any sin remains in them; and this salvation will not be in all things completed, till "death shall be swallowed up in victory." (Note, Rom. 13:11—14, v. 11.) The righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ have made "all things ready" for our salvation; the gospel calls us to partake of it; the regenerating Spirit of Christ quickened us when dead in sin, and brings us to repentance and faith. Thus excited and animated, we first diligently seek for an interest in Christ; next to "make our calling and election sure;" and then, for "the full assurance of hope unto the end." (Notes, Heb. 6:11,12. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.) In this way of diligence we also receive daily more and more of "salvation" itself, by liberty from sin, victory over it, peace and communion with God, and the earnestness of heavenly felicity; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:8,9.) and at the same time we glorify God, adorn the gospel, are useful to our brethren, and "shine as lights in the world."—In doing these things the Philippians were exhorted to consider, that God was even then working in them that willingness to repent, believe, and obey, of which they were conscious; and that ability to reduce their good desires to effect, which their past conduct evinced. In this, he had acted according to his purpose of "good-will to men;" and what they had experienced in this matter should animate them to more vigorous exertions, and direct them to depend wholly on God to enable them for every good work. (Marg. Ref. l—n.)—"To will, &c. (13) 'We are not therefore stocks, but are willing in 'doing well: not that God helps the imbecility 'of our will; but that from being evil he makes 'it good, and that wholly of his grace.' Beza.—"And to do.] 'He does not say, that we may 'have the faculty of willing, and doing well if 'we will: but he says, that the efficacious gift 'of willing and doing well is bestowed on us.' Beza. This shows the nature of divine influences upon the mind; according to the constitution of the rational nature, and not against it; by producing in us "a willing mind," to use all means of obtaining help and deliverance, and not by driving or constraining us against our will. By the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, the mind and heart are prepared, to discern and love truth and holiness; the gospel sets objects before us, and proposes them to us, suited to this new state of mind and heart; and we accordingly "choose" them, without the least infringement of our liberty. We feel no force, we are perfectly voluntary; we act according to our present feelings and desires, as if the whole were from ourselves:

and perhaps it is not till long after, that we learn from what Author and Source, the revolution in our judgment and affections, which led to "newness of life," originated: nay, numbers cannot clearly discern this, during their subsequent earthly course. In short, "the carnal mind is enmity against God;" all are by nature "carnally minded;" none are of themselves "willing" to repent and believe the gospel, according to the word of God; none can be compelled to do these things against their will; but "God works in us to will and to do of his good pleasure." "The grace of God 'by Christ preventing us, that we may have a 'good will, and working with us, when we 'have that good will.' (Art. x.) If the opposers of the doctrine, improperly called Calvinistic, in former and later times, had been willing and able to understand those against whom they have contended and still contend, it would have saved them immense labor, in combating sentiments, which few comparatively maintain, in the sense which they seem to suppose. One of these opposers, however, has repeatedly quoted, operatur in vobis velle, as one of Calvin's dreadful dogmas, when it is the vulgar translation, and an exact version of St. Paul's words, which we render, "worketh in us to will!" In fact, our zealous opponents are not unfrequently betrayed into similar mistakes. "He worketh in us effectually; ... that we may effectually work."—The man, in whom God has wrought effectually to will, and who yet cannot fully accomplish what he wills but earnestly cries to God to help and deliver him, is evidently described by the apostle. (Notes, Rom. 7:12—25.)

Note.—In all their concerns, whether secular or religious, the Christians at Philippi were exhorted to avoid every kind of "murmuring" against the appointments of God, and "grudging" of one another; and all angry controversies and reasonings, and ambitious competitions for pre-eminence. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Note, 1—4.) Thus they would be "blameless," and not liable to be accused by their neighbors, as contentious, selfish, deceitful, or injurious; their whole conduct would be "harmless" and inoffensive, as well as benevolent; and they would appear to be "the children of God," by the purity, equity, and love exhibited in their characters. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Eph. 5:1,2.) They would escape the reproach and censure of observers: and their bold profession of the gospel in the face of persecutors, joined with their holy conversation and spiritual worship, would cause them to "shine" amidst their immoral, idolatrous, and licentious countrymen, as "lights in the world." The words may be rendered as the imperative, "Shine ye, &c." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, Is. 60:1—3. Matt. 5:14—16.)—The notion indeed, to which they belonged, was "crooked, deceitful, injurious, and perverse;" which appeared in their conduct towards one another, as well as in their persecution of the Christians: but the doctrine and example of consistent believers would tend to enlighten them, and to direct their way to Christ and holiness; even as the light-house warns the mariners to avoid the rocks, and directs their course into the harbor; or as the luminaries of heaven enlighten the earth. This must be attempted not only by "holding fast" the truth; but by "holding forth the word of life," in their profession, discourse, public ordinances, and holy actions. In this manner they would certainly be "saved themselves," and be instruments of "saving others;" and the good work, begun among them, would be diffused widely, and perpetuated to other generations. (Marg. Ref. x, y. John 15:12—16. P. O. 9—16.) This would enable the apostle to anticipate the joy reserved for him "in the day of Christ," when it would appear, that his labors at Philippi had not been fruitless, and that he had not run as one that loses the race. And, provided their faith, and its blessed fruits, were thus presented in Christ Jesus, as an acceptable and honorable sacrifice and service to God; if he should be offered on that sacrifice, by the shedding of his blood, as a martyr in the glorious cause, as the drink-offerings were poured upon the sacrifices, (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z—b,) he would be so far from regretting this event, that he would rejoice at thus suffering for the confirmation of their faith; and "congratulate them," yea, share their happiness, even while enduring the agonies of death. He would not therefore have them be troubled on his account; but rather rejoice with him, and for him, as a very happy man, even in his imprisonment, and in the prospect of a violent death! (Marg. Ref. c. c.)—Nothing can exceed the genuine magnanimity and disinterested love, expressed in this most beautiful passage. The Athenian who came mortally wounded from the battle of Marathon, with news of a glorious victory, and having said to the Rulers, ‘Rejoice ye, we rejoice,’ (χαίρετε, χαίρομεν,) then dropt down dead before them, has been greatly admired, and justly, as a patriot and a hero: but in the view of a future and eternal world, it does not appear that his joy was rational. “He did it for a corruptible crown,” the apostle, for “an incorruptible,” to himself and multitudes.

22 But † ye know the proof of him, that, † as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the gospel.

23 Him therefore I hope to send presently, † so soon as I shall see how it will go with me.

Note.—The apostle did not suppose, that he was directly to suffer death: and he “trusted in the Lord Jesus,” in whose hand all hearts and events were, that he should be enabled “shortly to send Timothy” to inquire into the state of their souls, and that of the church; the result of which, he was persuaded, would conduce to his comfort. He had selected him for this service, because he had, at that time, no one with him of so excellent a spirit as Timothy, and so entirely coincident with himself in his views and aims; or who would be concerned for their welfare, with so prudent, tender, and assiduous an affection, like the natural love of parents to their children. For all sought their own ease, safety, interest, credit, or indulgence; which often interfered with the work, honor, and cause of Christ. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f.—l.) Probably, this was wholly the case with several, who had offered their assistance to Paul, but had declined difficult and perilous services: others, perhaps, had rendered themselves suspected, by the same selfish conduct; and most concerned had given the apostle cause for dissatisfaction, by preferring easier and more secure services, to those of far greater importance, but connected with more self-denial, labor and peril. It may be supposed, that several of his most approved helpers were absent on other services, and others might be fully employed at Rome: but after all deductions and limitations, the apostle’s complaint must stand, as a lamentable testimony to the selfishness of human nature.—The Christians at Philippi, however, had already had experimental proof of Timothy; and they well knew, that he had imbibed the very mind of the apostle, as “his genuine son in the faith:” and that he was ever ready to enter into his views, to concur in his measures, to observe his directions, to consult his comfort, and to labor, venture, and suffer in the cause of Christ; and in serving with him, to make known the gospel, “as a son with his father.” (Marg. Ref. m, n.) But, he deemed it better not to send him, till he knew how his own cause would be decided, which he continually expected to come on before the Emperor’s tribunal. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—The words, “trust in the Lord Jesus,” as introduced with reference to a providential concern, and not any thing immediately relating to his salvation and grace, should not pass unnoticed. Perhaps the most satisfactory assurance of our Lord’s Deity, may be obtained by carefully noting such words, as seem to drop without design from the pen of the sacred writers, and which are seldom noticed in the controversy; but which can in no other way be reconciled to the other scriptures. (Notes, Ps. 146:3; 4. Jer. 17:5—8. Eph. 1:9—14.) This shows, that Timothy had been at Philippi with the apostle; yet the history does not expressly mention it: (Notes, Acts 16:6—40.) but, by carefully comparing one part of the narrative with another, this appears evidently to have been the case. (Acts 16:1—3. 17:14,15.) Undesigned coincidences of this kind, between the history and the Epistles, prove that both are genuine; and if genuine, then inspired.

24 But <sup>p</sup> I trust in the Lord, that I also myself shall come shortly.

25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you <sup>q</sup> Epaphroditus, <sup>r</sup> my brother, <sup>s</sup> and companion in labor, <sup>t</sup> and fellow-soldier, <sup>u</sup> but your messenger, <sup>v</sup> and he that ministered to my wants.

26 For <sup>y</sup> he longed after you all, and was <sup>z</sup> full of heaviness, because that <sup>a</sup> ye had heard that he had been sick.

27 For indeed he was sick <sup>b</sup> nigh unto death: <sup>c</sup> but God had mercy on him: and not on him only, <sup>d</sup> but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

28 I sent him therefore the more carefully, that, when <sup>e</sup> ye see him again, ye may rejoice, <sup>f</sup> and that I may be the less sorrowful.

30 Because for <sup>k</sup> the work of Christ he was <sup>l</sup> nigh unto death, not regarding his life, <sup>m</sup> to supply your lack of service toward me.

Note.—The apostle was satisfied, as “trusting in the Lord,” that he should speedily regain his liberty, and be enabled to pay the Philippians another visit. But before he could either spare Timothy, or come himself; he judged it necessary to send Epaphroditus, whom he owned as a “brother, a companion in labor, and a fellow-soldier,” and whom they had sent as “their messenger,” to bring him a supply to his urgent necessities. (Marg. Ref. p—x.—Notes, 4:10—20.) Probably, Epaphroditus was a pastor of the church at Philippi; and, being absent from his stated charge, “he longed after” the people, and his labors of love among them: especially he “was in heaviness, because they had heard” of his sickness, and the thought of their sorrow, on his account, was more painful to him than his own sickness! (Marg. Ref. y—a.) What a beautiful and admirable instance of genuine sensibility and affection is here most simply exhibited! In what book, except the scriptures, do we meet with such?—Indeed, Epaphroditus had been very dangerously ill; but God had graciously restored him for further usefulness; and in this he had shown mercy to the apostle also; to whom it would have been an additional sorrow, if so excellent a person had lost his life, by ministering to him in his bonds. (Marg. Ref. b—d.)—It does not appear, that any miracle was wrought in this case; and we may thence infer, that the gift of miracles could only be exercised on particular occasions, of which those endued with them had some previous intimation. This is clearly indicated: and it shows, that the apostle was as ready to own his want of power when truth required it, as to speak of his miracles when needful.—On account therefore of the late sickness of Epaphroditus, the apostle had been the more careful to send him back; that the joy of the Philippians might be increased, by seeing their beloved minister in health again: for the very thought of that joy would alleviate his sorrows, though at a distance from them; and though by that means he lost Epaphroditus’s assistance and company. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) He would, therefore, have them “to receive him,” for the Lord’s sake, with all expressions of thankful joy; and to esteem and highly honor, such affectionate laborious ministers. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:12—15.) For indeed the sickness of Epaphroditus had been the effect of his excess of diligence in the work of Christ: as he had not even “regarded his life;” that, in the place of the absent Philippians, he might render every possible service to the apostle, both in his personal concerns, and in those relating to the propagation of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. g—m.)—As Philippi lay at a great distance from Rome; Epaphroditus must have continued with the apostle a considerable time; or the report of his sickness at Rome could not have reached Philippi, and that of their sorrow have reached Rome before Epaphroditus left that city; and consequently the epistle must have been written towards the close of the apostle’s two years’ imprisonment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

All our consolations, hopes, and experience of “the fellowship of the Spirit, and the bowels and mercies” of God our Saviour, as well as all our regard to our own peace, should engage us to be “of one mind” with our brethren, and so “to fulfil the joy” of all wise and faithful ministers and Christians. Nothing so honors Christ, defeats the machinations of his enemies, or fills the soul with consolation, as this holy love; but envy, contention, and ambition, not only disturb the peace of the church, but torture the soul which entertains them. Neither inward nor outward peace can be enjoyed, except in proportion as "in lowliness of mind we esteem others better than ourselves, and look at the things of others as well as at our own." These are hard sayings to the proud and carnal heart of man. Many have learned the doctrines of the gospel very accurately, who have not "thus learned Christ." (Note, Eph. 4: 20—24.) We cannot study this subject successfully, except by continually "looking unto Jesus;" but, while faith penetrates the veil of sensible objects, and contemplates the Saviour "in the form of God, and thinking it no robbery to be equal with God;" yet making himself of no reputation, assuming the form of a servant, and the nature of man; appearing as an infant in the manger, as a poor carpenter at Nazareth, as an indigent and despised preacher in Galilee and Judea; as "obedient to the law" during his life, and as an insulted criminal at his death upon the cross: when these things are contemplated, and the height of his essential glory is contrasted with the depth of his voluntary abasement, and with the motives and effects of this stupendous transaction; we see such obligations and encouragements to self-denying love, as the whole universe besides can never supply; and "beholding, as in a glass, this glory of our Lord, we are" gradually "changed into his image." (Notes, 2 Cor. 3: 17, 18. Heb. 12:2, 3.) And while we contemplate his subsequent exaltation, and "the name given" to this lowly Sufferer, "above every name," we learn to abase ourselves that we may be exalted, to serve others in order to our own best interest, and "to labor and suffer reproach," that we may ensure "glory, honor, and immortality." But, "as every knee must bow to Christ," as "every tongue must confess him to be Lord, to the glory of God the Father;" let us examine whether we do indeed thus reverence, love, obey, and worship the incarnate Son of God; or whether we are yet among those enemies, who must be bruised under his feet shortly. (Note, and P. O. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.)

Even those professed Christians, of whom we have the most favorable opinion, should be exhorted, not only to "be obedient," as in the presence of their pastors; but to increase in circumspection, when removed from under their faithful care. Thus ought we all to "work out our own salvation," with jealous fear and humble caution; waiting for "the full assurance of hope," and the renewal of our souls to holiness, in the way of simple dependence, diligent obedience, and assiduous humble attendance on the ordinances of God: thanking him for "working in us" the willing mind, and fervently calling upon him for grace still more effectually to incline our hearts, and increase our decided willingness; and to enable us to perform the duties incumbent on us.—Surely some zealous advocates for evangelical truths have never read this chapter, for they can do nothing "without murmurings and disputings!" These are their element: these are the unhallowed "weapons of their warfare." How can they be "blameless and harmless," on this plan, when "envy and strife" are inseparable from "confusion and every evil work?" And how can they think themselves the "children of God," who in so many features bear the express image of Satan? But let us pray to be made peaceable, humble, unambitious, and inoffensive, both in the church and in the community, that "by well doing we may put to silence" the calumnies of ungodly men: and that we may be "without rebuke" in the midst of this our nation; which alas! is proved to be "crooked and perverse," by the prevalence of infidelity, impiety, and every kind of immorality, under a Christian profession, and abundant means of religious instruction! Let us then endeavor to "shine" among our neighbors, "as lights in the world," and to "hold forth the word of life" in our families and circle, by an open profession of evangelical truth, connected with a holy conversation. Then the ministers, who have preached the gospel, will anticipate their "rejoicing in the day of Christ," assured that it will appear, that "they did not run in vain, nor labor in vain," and hoping that far more extensive and permanent good was done, than they lived to witness. (Note, 2 Pet. 1: 12—15. P. O. 12—18.) In such a prospect, a zealous servant of Christ would be animated to a readiness for death in his Master's cause; while the exultation of faith and grace would conquer nature's reluctance to suffering; and certainly they, who have been thus "offered upon the sacrifice" of their brethren's faith, are to be considered as objects of peculiar congratulation, for they have almost universally died rejoicing and triumphant.

V. 19—30.

Alas! in the best times, how few are "like-minded" with the apostle, and "naturally care" for the state of the church, and of their fellow-Christians! For while numbers, evidently and wholly, seek their own interest, reputation, ease, or indulgence, "and not the things of Jesus Christ;" we are all too attentive to personal concerns, and often allow them to interfere with our usefulness. So that a man, who is ready to engage, even in a service of great importance, where no emolument or credit can be expected, and in which losses, hardships, perils, and sufferings must be encountered, is deemed a prodigy, and rather an object of astonishment, not to say censure and pity, than of imitation.—If then the apostle made this grievous complaint concerning the ministers of Christianity, in his days; what would he say, were he now on earth, to witness and give his sentiments and judgment on the whole body of professed Christian ministers, of all ranks, and titles, and names, in these degenerate times! What language could do justice to his deep but mingled feelings!—But, let us seek deliverance from this mean regard to our own ease, interest, or accommodation, by an increase of zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men: that those who best "know the proof of us" may perceive, that we should have been ready to serve with Paul, in all his self-denying labors, like dutiful sons with an honored father. In this manner young ministers should attach themselves to the most faithful, zealous, and useful of their seniors; to learn, as it were, the science and skill of the spiritual warfare under such veteran and experienced soldiers: and thus aged ministers should communicate their views to their younger brethren; and endeavor also to instill into them those principles of activity, by which they have been excited to self-denying, disinterested diligence in the work of the Lord; that they may be able to introduce them into useful services, as their companions in labor, and approved fellow-soldiers.—What an ingenious spirit does the gospel inspire! The most eminent ministers, who most simply “trust the Lord Jesus” for every thing, will yet frankly acknowledge their obligations for temporal assistance to those, who owe their salvation to their labors of love. The affectionate pastor will be more full of heaviness, for the grief of his people on his account, than for his own pain and sickness: and he will “long after them,” and to renew his labors among them, as a tender mother does after her beloved infant.—The Lord often afflicts such zealous and affectionate Christians, to manifest the excellency of their disposition; but he “will have mercy upon them,” and not let them “have sorrow upon sorrow;” and they will readily put themselves to inconveniences to remove the grief or increase the comfort of their brethren; rejoicing, though at a distance, in the thoughts of their joy, as an alleviation of their own sorrow. Those ministers who thus spend their strength, and disregard even life and health in his cause, and to “supply the lack of service” of those who are incapable of performing it, should be peculiarly honored by the church, and by every Christian: yet none should, without necessity, be kept very long from the people of their own peculiar charge.

CHAP. III.

The apostle exhorts to joy in the Lord, and gives cautions against false teachers, 1:2; shows that the church of real Christians are the true “circumcision,” 3; and that he had better grounds of carnal confidence, than most of those who trusted in the law, or inward distinctions, 4—6; but he had learned to count all his gain loss, for Christ; yet, that he still counted all things, as loss and dung, compared with the knowledge of Christ, and “the righteousness of God by faith” in him, 7—9; desiring also, to know the power of his resurrection, and to be conformed to him, even in suffering and death; if so be he might attain to the resurrection of the just, 10, 11. He owns, that he was not yet “perfected;” but that he anxiously and earnestly sought “this high prize of his calling;” 12—14. He exhorts to an imitation of his example, 15—17; as many, professing Christianity, “walked after the flesh,” in the way of destruction, 18, 19; with whom he contrasts true Christians, their heavenly conversation, and their expectation of Christ to raise their “vile body,” and render it “like to his glorified body.” 20, 21.

FINALLY, my brethren, <sup>b</sup> rejoice in the Lord. <sup>c</sup> To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe.

3 For <sup>g</sup> we are the circumcision, which <sup>h</sup> worship God in the Spirit, and <sup>i</sup> rejoice in Christ Jesus, and <sup>k</sup> have no confidence in the flesh:

4 Though <sup>l</sup> I might also have confidence in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more:

6 Concerning <sup>r</sup> zeal, ‘persecuting the church;’ touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless.

7 But what things <sup>a</sup> were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ.

Note.—The apostle deemed it needful, to close the preceding practical exhortations, by calling on his brethren at Philippi to “rejoice in the Lord” Jesus, and in their relation to him, as their Glory and Salvation. (Note, 4:4.) This he had often inculcated by various methods, and it was not difficult for him to repeat the same instruction: but it was safe for them, and suited to their afflicted circumstances. Some think he meant, that it was easy for him, but safe for them, to write the same things to them, which he had written to other churches. (Marg. Ref. a—c.)—He also warned them to “beware of dogs.” The Jews contemptuously called the Gentiles dogs; but the bigoted, selfish, Judaizing teachers are supposed to be here intended by that emblem; as they could fawn on those that favored them; yet were greedy, snarling, and ready to bite or devour such as opposed them. Perhaps apostates from Christianity are meant. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Mic. 3:5—7. Matt. 7:6.) The “evil workers” may also include those teachers and professors, who perverted the doctrines of grace, and indulged themselves in sin, as a part of their Christian liberty. He also warned his brethren to “beware of the concision,” or the cutting off: the Judaizers laid much stress on cutting off the foreskin, though they did not mortify the deeds of the body: they wanted to cut off the Gentiles from the church, but they cut off themselves and others from salvation, by their dependence on the works of the law. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) The honorable title of “the circumcision” did not therefore belong to them. That ancient rite was no longer of any value: Christians were “the true circumcision,” the covenant-people of God, the spiritual seed of Abraham: “the righteousness of faith” was sealed to them by the circumcision of the heart, of which baptism was the outward sign. (Notes, Rom. 2:25—29, 4:9—17.) They “worshipped God in the Spirit,” not merely according to external forms, but spiritually, with their hearts and under the teaching of the Holy Spirit; (Note, John

4:21—24.) and they “rejoiced,” or “gloried,” in Jesus Christ the Subject of all the prophecies, and the Substance of all the shadows, of the old dispensation; and they “had no confidence in the flesh;” or in any thing which man might possess, while unregenerate and an unbeliever. (Marg. Ref. g—k.—Note, 1 Pet. 1: 23—25.)—The apostle did not thus put himself on a level with the Gentile converts, because he had nothing of a carnal or external nature to depend on: for, if any man supposed himself to have distinctions of this kind in which to glory, he could evince that he had more. He had been circumcised on the eighth day, according to the law and custom: he could trace back his genealogy to Israel and Abraham: he was of the tribe of Benjamin, which was descended from Rachel the wife of Jacob’s choice; and which never apostatized from the worship of God at the temple, as most of the other tribes had done. Both his parents were Hebrews; so that he was neither born nor educated a Hellenist Jew, who might be supposed less exact in the law. As a Pharisee, he had been peculiarly strict both in the Mosaic ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders: his persecution of the church proved his zeal for the Jewish religion; (Note, Gal. 1:11—14.) and his whole conduct was externally so conformable to the letter of the law, that, in respect of that kind of righteousness, no one could lay any thing to his charge. (Marg. Ref. l—t.—Notes, Matt. 19:16—22. Rom. 7:9—12.) But all those things, which he once deemed most advantageous to him, and conducive to his acceptance with God, as well as to his reputation and preferment, he at length had learned to “account loss for Christ;” being fully assured, that if he depended on them, or cleaved to them, they would prevent his salvation by the grace of the gospel. He had therefore willingly renounced them all; as the merchant in a storm casts overboard his most valuable property, lest it should occasion the loss of his life. (*Notes, Is. 2:19—21. Jon. 1:4—6. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—“The present time is to be noted: ... so that the apostle, as to what relates to justification before God, excludes all works; those which follow, as well as those which precede ‘faith.’ Beza.—The apostle not only had judged at his first conversion, that his legal righteousness, and his worldly prospects, were “loss to him,” compared with Christ; but, after many years spent in successfully preaching the gospel, with apostolical authority, abundant miraculous gifts, immense labors, extraordinary success, multiplied sufferings, and most exemplary holiness; he decidedly “counted all these things to be loss,” in comparison of “the most excellent knowledge of Christ” from revelation, by faith, and subsequent experience in the glory of his Person and redemption. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Notes, 1 Chr. 28:9. Is. 53:11,12. Matt. 11:25—27. John 17:1—3, v. 3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. 1 John 5:20,21.) For his sake, whom he rejoiced to call “his Lord,” he had “suffered the loss of” his worldly friends, prospects, and interests: and his vigor of mind, his superior talents, his learning, and his connexion with the great, had seemed to promise him great prosperity. But he had renounced all, even his country and liberty: and he continually expected, that he should be called to lay down his life in this cause. Yet he accounted all these likewise to be most worthless in comparison of Christ, as the ground of his hope of acceptance with God, and of eternal salvation. He therefore gladly parted with them in order to win “the Pearl of great price,” which alone could make him rich, honorable, and happy for ever. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) For his great desire was “to be found in Christ” “in the hour of death, and at the day of judgment;” as Noah was in the ark, when the deluge swept away an unbelieving world: and to stand before God, not having, as his plea or title to life, “his own righteousness,” which, having the law of God as its measure, could only condemn him; but “that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith,” even that righteousness, which God imputes to the believing sinner; namely, the perfect obedience (Marg. Ref. k-o.—Notes, Rom. 6:3—11. Eph. 1:15—23, vv. 19,20. Col. 2:11, 12. 3:1—4.) The apostle did not mean that he doubted of this happy event of his labors: (Note, 1:21—26.) but he showed what was the great object which he pursued, and for which he renounced all other hopes and prospects, and endured such complicated trials; and he instructed others in the way of obtaining and possessing an assured hope. (Note, 1 Cor. 9:24—27.)—It is evident, that the apostle speaks, not of the resurrection in general, for this will be both “of the just and of the unjust;” but of “the resurrection to eternal life,” in that glorious view of it, which is afterwards given. (Note, 20,21.)—When the sinner believes in Christ, he is immediately “justified by faith, and has peace with God;” yet he “through the Spirit waits for the hope of righteousness by faith;” for at the day of judgment, when living faith will be distinguished by its fruits from dead faith, the sentence of justification will not only be confirmed, but proclaimed to the whole assembled world. 13 Brethren, “I count not myself to have apprehended: but this <sup>x</sup> one thing I do; <sup>y</sup> forgetting those things which are behind, <sup>z</sup> and reaching forth unto those things which are before,

Note.—The apostle did not mention his simple dependence and earnestness of soul, as a proof that he had attained the prize, or “was already perfected” in his Saviour’s image. On the contrary, he continued still pursuing; and aiming, by further labors and progress in holiness, to finish his course and obtain the prize, for which he had been graciously arrested by the Lord Jesus, when he was a malignant persecutor. He disregarded all past attainments and services; as the racer in the Isthmian games seemed to forget the ground over which he had run, and the competitors whom he had left behind; and he reached forth to further labors, and increased conformity to Christ, without loitering or weariness; as the racer exerted all his vigor and agility, to outstrip those before him, and to pass over the remainder of his course. (Marg. Ref. p—u.) “One thing” engaged his attention, to the exclusion of all interluring considerations: thus he “pressed forward to the mark” with unremitting speed, that he might receive the prize of heavenly glory, which God had called on him, by Jesus Christ, to aspire after: even as the racer urged his course to the goal; keeping the victor’s crown full in view, and animated by the acclamations of those, who excited him “so to run that he might obtain.” (Marg. Ref. x—b.—Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—27. Heb. 12:1—3.) When we consider what the apostle had actually attained; (Notes, 8—11. 1:19—26. 4:8—13.) even so much genuine holiness, that very few can endure a comparison of their own attainments with his: and yet consider him as acknowledging that he had not attained, and as “pressing forward” at something far higher: we may form our judgment of every modern pretence to sinless perfection, as well as of our own exceedingly inferior proficiency. 16 Nevertheless, ° whereto we have already attained, ° let us walk by the same rule, ° let us mind the same thing.

Note.—The apostle next exhorted all those who were "perfect," to be like-minded with him in the things above stated; "counting all but loss for Christ," deeming their present attainments inconsiderable, and "pressing forward to the mark." This exhortation (Note, 12—14.) implies, that the temper and conduct before described form the Christian's highest perfection in this world.—The word here rendered "perfect," may signify the sound character of the established believer, the man, who is matured in judgment and experience, and has made great progress in Christianity. It is used in the Greek authors, especially Xenophon, for men of full age, (about thirty,) as distinguished from boys and young men; and the apostle conveys a similar idea by it in other passages. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Note, Heb. 5:11—14.)—In this way Christians would best wait for further instruction: and if any were otherwise minded than their brethren, or than the apostle, being under some mistake or misapprehension; by thus avoiding disputation, and diligently practising what they knew, from evangelical principles, they might hope that God would make known to them those things, of which they still remained ignorant; and their stronger brethren ought to bear with their prejudices, till they were in this manner obviated. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Rom. 14:1—4. 15:1—3.) Nevertheless, they all ought to be exceedingly careful, not to decline from that measure of faith, diligence, constancy, and holiness, to which they had attained: but that, by "walking according to the same rule," of divine truth, and "minding the same thing," and using means of improvement in which they had hitherto proceeded, they might keep the ground which they had gained, and make further progress; being especially careful not to grow slack in one part of religion, by becoming zealous in another. (Marg. Ref. f.—h.)

Note.—In full confidence that he acted with propriety and exhibited a highly instructive example, in the conduct above described, the apostle called on his children at Philippi to unite together in imitating him; and to observe and copy such Christians as followed his example, and that of Timothy and Silas, in these respects. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) For alas! "many walked" in a very different manner. He had often spoken to them against the contagious principles and examples of some professed Christians; and he now mentioned them, not with acrimony or resentment, but "with tears" of compassion for their souls, and of grief for the dishonor which they brought upon the gospel. (Marg. Ref. l.—n.) For, in fact, they were most dangerous "enemies to the cross of Christ." They did not approve, nay they hated, the holy import of that instructive transaction, even the crucifixion of the divine Saviour, which was the grand display of the holiness of God, of the excellency of the law, and of the evil of sin; (Note, Gal. 6:11—14.) and their licentious lives more disgraced the doctrine of the cross, than all the obloquy and opposition of avowed enemies. "The end" of their vain profession, if persisted in, would certainly be final "perdition;" as "their god was their belly," the indulgence of their appetites was the chief good which they proposed to themselves, and the chief satisfaction which they sought: to this base idol they sacrificed the most important interests, and from it they expected their happiness, instead of seeking it from the Lord. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Pet. 2:12—14.) At the same time, they "gloried" in their licentious doctrines, practices, and success in making proselytes and corrupting others; of which they ought to have been "ashamed," and which would certainly terminate in their deep disgrace. For they were "carnally minded," and not "savoring" heavenly things, they "minded," and primarily regarded, worldly pleasures and interests. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Matt. 16:21—23, v. 23. Rom. 8:5—9. Col. 3:1—4.)—Some expositors explain this, almost exclusively, of the Judaizing teachers and their followers; but others suppose the Gnostics to be especially meant, and doubtless many among each of these were of this stamp. Yet there were others also who perverted the gospel; and the apostle's words at least equally point out licentious Antinomian professors, whether Jews or Gentiles; of which we cannot doubt that many sprang up in every part of 21 Who <sup>a</sup> shall change our vile body, <sup>a</sup> that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to <sup>b</sup> the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

Note.—In opposition to the base and grovelling characters before described, the apostle here showed, that true Christians are "citizens of heaven," where their hearts and treasures are lodged, and whence their hopes and comforts are derived, so that their judgment, affections, and conduct must be of a heavenly nature. Thence also all true believers expect the coming of Christ "to be their Judge," and are continually preparing to meet him. (Marg. Ref. t—y.) Instead of idolizing animal gratifications, they deem the body itself at present to be a "vile body, a body of humiliation," being the seat of ensnaring appetites, the instrument of sins, the encumbrance of the soul in duty, liable to manifold and loathsome diseases, and condemned to return to corruption and dust. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:39—44, vv. 42—44.) But they expect that Christ, at his second coming, will "change" their bodies, fashioning them into a complete conformity to his glorified body, rendering them incorruptible and spiritual, and thus preparing them to participate and improve the holy felicity of the immortal soul, to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. a.) This the Saviour will effect by his own omnipotent operation, according to that "working" by which he is able to subdue all things to himself, and so give them final deliverance from death, their last enemy. (Marg. Ref. b.)—The contrast between "the body of our humiliation," and the "body of his glory," into the likeness of which Jesus will change our bodies, is remarkable. There seems to be a reference to the transfiguration. (Notes, Matt. 17:1—8.)—If omnipotence is an incommunicable divine perfection, the apostle's language doubtless attests his Deity, in the most emphatical language. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:50—54.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

We ought to be "zealous of good works," but to "rejoice in the Lord" alone. (Notes, Is. 12:1—3. 45:23—25. 61:10,11. Hab. 3:17—19.)—Repetitions on such important subjects, though easy to the teacher, are safe to the hearers, and must not be deemed superfluous; being often far more useful than the most original, ingenious, admired, or learned disquisitions.—We cannot too earnestly guard men against those, who either oppose or pervert the doctrine of salvation by mercy and grace alone. Many of these are greedy of their own interest, fierce against their opposers, and ready to rend in pieces the church, in order to propagate their own peculiar notions or observances; though some are more plausible.—But we should also protest against "evil workers" of every description, with decision and impartiality. The true Christian will be aware of them; he "worships God in the Spirit, glories in Christ Jesus," has "the circumcision of the heart," and confides in nothing of which unregenerate men are capable. (Notes, Jer. 9:23, 24. Col. 2:10—12. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.)—But, how far short do many, who "have confidence in the flesh," come of the attainments of Saul the persecutor! Their birth of Christian parents, early baptism, and "form of godliness," can scarcely be imagined superior to his distinctions of a similar nature: but where is their strictness, their zeal, their morality, and their blameless conduct? Yet they trust in their poor scanty worthless forms and duties; and count them too valuable to be exchanged for Christ and his salvation! But if they ever "come to themselves," and become acquainted with God, his law, and their own characters; they will "count all their gain" to be "loss for Christ;" and if, in consequence of their conversion, they should lose all outward things, and endure all kinds of persecutions in the Lord's service; if they should labor more abundantly, and walk more holily, than their brethren; they will still "count even all these things but loss and dung, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ;" they will renounce all dependence on their best services, and esteem all worldly objects worthless, compared with the hope of "gaining Christ, and being found in him." They will deprecate, as sure destruction, having their eternal state in any measure decided according to their own righteousness: they will desire above all things to have "that righteousness which is through the faith of Christ, even the righteousness which is of God by faith." They will see, that no additions need be made to his "unsearchable riches," no security added to his sure refuge, no appendages to his robe of righteousness. Thus they will account themselves rich, safe, and happy, in proportion to their assurance of being “found in Christ,” and “made the righteousness of God in him:” but, in seeking for this assurance, as well as in order to glorify so bounteous and beloved a Friend; they will also earnestly desire, and aim at, a more transforming “knowledge of Christ,” a deeper experience of the power of his resurrection, and a nearer conformity to him in his sufferings and death, by dying to sin, and crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts. And, at the same time, the love of Christ will constrain them, if called to it, to suffer, yea, to die with him, that they may be also glorified together: if so be, they may, by any means, be partakers of the resurrection to eternal felicity in heaven.

V. 12—21.

Thousands and ten thousands, yea millions, have testified, that the above is the judgment and experience of true Christians: nor can any measure of personal holiness or self-denying labors satisfy the man, who “counts all but loss that he may win Christ,” and be justified by faith in him alone. He still “counts not himself to have attained;” he is continually humbled for his manifold defects and defilements; he still “follows after,” in hope of attaining to that prize, for which he was apprehended, when a careless, ignorant sinner, a wretched sensualist, or a proud formalist, by the Saviour’s preventing grace. In his Christian course “he forgets the things which are behind, and reaches forth to those things which are before;” and presses forward to “the mark, for the prize of his high calling in Christ Jesus.” In these respects there are indeed very great disparities among real Christians; but all know something of these purposes, desires, and experiences. Those who are most “perfected and matured” in the life of faith and grace, still need exhortations to be thus minded: they who are newly set out, should be called on to emulate such honorable examples: and while they judge and act in this manner, as to these grand concerns, the Lord will guide them into the further knowledge of his truth and will. For satisfactory views of divine things are far better acquired by peaceable meditation and diligent obedience, than by eager and angry disputations. (Notes, John 7:14—17. 8:30—36.) We should, however, be very careful not to grow remiss and languid, in those things “to which we have already attained;” but still continue to “walk by the same rule, and mind the same things,” that we may make a perpetual progress in the divine life, and secure, as it were, every post of which we have got possession. Let us then assiduously endeavor to walk after the example of apostles and evangelists, that our conduct may be meet for others to copy with advantage; (Note, 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) for alas! in every age, there are professors of the gospel, of whom the humble, zealous Christian can scarcely think or speak, without sorrow and weeping. Of these, ministers must warn and caution their flocks in tender love: seeing “their end is destruction;” sensual indulgence is their filthy deity; they glory in their shameful abuse of the gospel, and “mind earthly things” under a religious profession. But let us, as citizens of heaven, “have our conversation” of a contrary nature: may we continually prepare for the coming of our judge, “that we may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless;” may we expect confidently to have our bodies of humiliation changed by his almighty power, into the fashion of his glorified body: and, in this prospect, may we apply to him daily to new-create our souls unto holiness; to deliver us from our enemies, “to bruise Satan under our feet,” and to employ both our bodies and souls as “instruments of righteousness” in his service on earth, till he shall come to receive us to his heavenly kingdom!

CHAP. IV.

The apostle affectionately exhorts and encourages the Christians at Philippi to steadfastness in the faith, concord among themselves, and joy in the Lord, 1—4; and to moderation, confidence in God, constant prayer and thanksgiving, and universal good behavior, 5—9. He declares his joy in the Lord, on account of their renewed care of him, in sending by Epaphroditus a supply for his wants, 10; for, though he had learned, and was able “through Christ strengthening him,” to be content in any station; they had done well in communicating with him in his affliction, 11—14. Indeed, they alone had formerly thus communicated with him; and he rejoiced that they were thus fruitful; as it would redound to their own profit; being a spiritual sacrifice peculiarly acceptable to God through Christ, who would abundantly supply all their wants, 15—19. To him he ascribes eternal glory, 20; and concludes with salutations and benedictions, 21—23.

THEREFORE, my brethren, dearly beloved <sup>b</sup> and longed for, <sup>c</sup> my joy and crown, <sup>d</sup> so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

Note.—This verse evidently relates to the subject with which the former chapter concluded. (Notes, 3:20, 21. 1 Cor. 15:55—58.) Seeing the Philippians had such hopes, and so powerful and gracious a Friend, let them stand fast in faith and obedience, amidst all enemies and temptations; as they had hitherto done, and as had been recommended to them. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Cor. 16:13, 14. 1 Thes. 3:6—10.)—The verse is principally remarkable for the variety of expressions, in which the apostle poured out the affection of his heart towards his brethren, or rather children, at Philippi. They were indeed “dearly beloved,” with them he longed to commune; (Note, 1:7, 8.) and he earnestly desired to be still more useful to them. He counted them “his joy and crown” amidst all his sorrow and disgrace; and he expected that they would be so in the day of Christ. (Note, 1:27—30. 1 Thes. 2:17—20.)

Note.—It is probable, that Euodias and Syntyche were women of note at Philippi, who on some account had disagreed; this both impeded their usefulness, and tended to cause divisions in the church. The apostle therefore entreated them to accommodate their differences, by mutual concessions and forgivenesses; so that they might be “of one mind in the Lord,” for his sake, and in seeking the peace and welfare of his church. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Matt. 5: 23,34. 18:15—17. 1 Cor. 6:1—6. Eph. 4:30—32. Col. 3:12—15.) The “true yoke-fellow,” or genuine associate in the work of Christ, whom the apostle addressed without naming, was doubtless well known at Philippi; though our conjectures respecting him must be precarious. Some think that the person intended was husband to one of the women above-mentioned; others that he was some eminent minister at Philippi. The apostle, however, entreated him to use his influence, in bringing those women to a cordial agreement, and in helping them to accomplish all their good designs, for the honor of Christ and the promulgation of the gospel: for they had formerly labored, by their private endeavors, to promote the success of his public ministry; as Clement (or Clemens) also had done, and several others, whom he acknowledged as his fellow-laborers; and whose zeal and love emboldened him to say, that their names were enrolled in the book of life, among the elect of God and the heirs of heaven. (Marg. Ref. f.—i.—Notes, Is. 4: 3,4. Dan. 12:1. Luke 10:17—20. It signifies to wrestle together; to make painful, earnest, and perilous exertions, with union and concert, in order to accomplish an important object.

Note.—(Notes, 2:14—18. 3:1—7, vv. 1—3.) The apostle again exhorts the Philippians to “rejoice in the Lord always,” even in the midst of persecutions, afflictions, and temptations; though they should be poor, bereaved, sick, imprisoned, or in danger of death; yea, notwithstanding their manifold sins, and their present lamented imperfections and defilements, the deplorable evils which they might witness among professed Christians, and the wretched state of the ruined world around them. For the favor, mercy, salvation, protection, and consolation of their all-sufficient and almighty Lord; the honor of their relation to him, the felicity of communion with him, and the eternal glory which he had prepared for them as his ransomed flock, comprised a joy, which might more than counterbalance all the causes of their sorrows; and which would satisfy and sanctify their hearts, and fortify them for self-denial, suffering, and death. Nor were they to consider this exhortation as given, without due consideration of their inward and outward impediments. Lest they should suppose this to be the case, he would again call upon them to “rejoice;” for he knew, that if they lived up to their privileges, and walked worthy of their high calling, they could never want cause for joy, and would generally be enabled to rejoice. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. 32:8—11. 33:1. 34: 1,2. Rom. 5:1—5. 12:9—13. 1 Thes. 5:16—22. Jam. 1:2—4. 1 Pet. 1:8,9.)—The Lord Jesus, or “God in Christ,” “God become our Salvation,” is especially meant, in all these animating calls to rejoice.

7 And <sup>t</sup> the peace of God, which <sup>u</sup> passeth all understanding, <sup>x</sup> shall keep your hearts and minds <sup>y</sup> through Christ Jesus.

Note.—In connexion with the holy joy above inculcated, and in order to it, the apostle exhorted his beloved brethren, to manifest an indifference concerning those worldly possessions, distinctions, and enjoyments, about which men in general contend and quarrel: that so, the “meekness” of their disposition might be known to all men, even to their enemies; who would perceive how “moderate” they were, as to the acquisition and use of outward things; and how composedly they suffered the loss or want of them, or any of those hardships, to which the injustice of their persecutors exposed them. (Note, Heb. 10:32—34.) This they should aim at, under a realizing assurance, that “the Lord was at hand.” The present life, with all its trials or enjoyments, was speedily vanishing; the Lord would soon come to receive the souls of his people to glory, and to terminate the prosperity of his enemies: nay, the day of final retribution would speedily arrive, with complete redemption to believers, and “perdition to ungodly men.” (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, 1 Cor. 7:29—31. Jam. 5:7—11. 1 Pet. 4:7.) Whatever then was taken from them, or wanting to them; whatever discouraged or distressed them, in their own concerns or those of their brethren; they ought to watch against unbelieving anxiety, and a useless solicitude about events. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Matt. 6:25. Luke 12:22—34.) In order to this, they ought, in every case, when any thing either relating to their spiritual or temporal concerns, to their families, or to the church, of whatever nature or magnitude, rendered them solicitous; ‘by prayer and supplication,’ for themselves and others, to “make their requests known unto God;” pouring out their hearts before him, and joining their fervent prayers with “thanksgiving” for mercies already received. (Marg. Ref. q. s.) In thus seeking to God, under a consciousness of their indigence, dependence, and unworthiness, and in believing reliance on his mercy, power, truth, and grace; they would find, that “the peace” which he alone could bestow, consisting of an inward, thankful, admiring sense of his forgiving love, an acquiescence in his will, a confidence in him for help, and a serene composure of the soul, would be vouchsafed to them. This peace indeed could not be understood by those who did not experience it, nor could any words give them an adequate idea of it; nay, even true believers could not fully explain its nature and excellency: but they would find their affections, and all the power of their souls, possessed and garrisoned by it, to the exclusion of alluring, alarming, and harassing temptations, through the merits of Christ, the supply of his Spirit, and the exercise of faith in him. (Marg. Ref. t—y.—Notes, Ps. 25:14. John 14:27,28. Rom. 15:8—13. Gal. 5:22—26. Col. 3:12—15. Rev. 2:17.)—This peace is “my peace,” says Jesus; it is the “fruit of the Spirit:” it is “the peace of God.”—Moderation. (5) ‘It means, meekness under provocation, readiness to forgive injuries, equity in the management of business, candor in judging characters and actions, ... sweetness of disposition, and the entire government of the passions.’ Macknight. ‘Equity; a mind moderate as to the things of this life, and by no means strictly exacting what is justly due.’ Beza.—“The Lord is at hand” (5), or near. Some understand the clause of his being a present Help in trouble. Others suppose the apostle meant, that the Lord would speedily come to destroy Jerusalem, and deprive the Jews of that power and influence, by which they became the general instigators of persecution. Probably this interpretation was adopted, lest it should be inferred, that the apostle erroneously supposed the day of judgment to be near at hand; but it is by no means satisfactory. It is, however, the manner of the sacred writers, to consider all temporal things as short, and the end of them as “at hand,” and “the Judge as at the door:” and, seeing death is the same, in a great measure, to individuals, as judgment will be to the world at large; their language is in this respect highly suitable and proper.—With thanksgiving.

(6) ‘Thus David, very often beginning with lamentations and tears, concludes with thanks-giving.’ Beza.—The mind and heart are distinguished. “The peace of God,” and the happy experience of it, fortifies and garrisons the intellectual faculties, against the cavils, objections, and vain reasonings of infidels, skeptics, philosophers, and heretics; and the affections against the allurements and terrors of worldly objects; and both mind and heart against all the temptations of the devil.

Note.—The substance of the practical exhortations, which the apostle had further to give, might be comprised in few words. Whatsoever tempers, words, or actions in any way expressed truth, candor, sincerity, or fidelity; whatsoever appeared grave, “venerable,” or respectable; whatsoever was just and upright, stamped with probity and integrity; whatsoever evinced purity, chastity, and temperance; whatsoever was amiable, or friendly; whatsoever was justly of good report, and approved as virtuous or commendable, among men; let the Philippians continually “think of these things,” form a due estimate of the value of each, adopt such as were really good, and endeavor to manifest them in every part of their conduct. (Marg. Ref. b—k.) In short, let them practise what he had taught them, and what they had received as teachable scholars; what they had heard from him, and witnessed in his example: and then he could confidently assure them of the comforting and protecting presence of their reconciled God, (as the Author of inward and outward peace,) with their souls and in their assemblies. 10 But <sup>p</sup> I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last <sup>q</sup> your care of me <sup>r</sup> hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but <sup>r</sup> ye lacked opportunity.

11 Not that I speak <sup>s</sup> in respect of want; for <sup>t</sup> I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content.

12 I know both <sup>u</sup> how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things <sup>x</sup> I am instructed, both to be full, and to be hungry, both to abound, and to suffer need.

13 I <sup>y</sup> can do all things <sup>z</sup> through Christ which strengtheneth me.

Note.—The apostle would not conclude his epistle, without a special acknowledgment of the kindness shown him by the Philippians. It had indeed “greatly rejoiced him in the Lord,” with reference to his providence, will, and glory; that, after a considerable time, their care of him had flourished again, as a tree shoots forth its buds in the spring. This not only excited him to thank God, for putting it into their hearts to supply his urgent necessities; but it made him joyful as it evinced the prosperous state of their souls. Indeed, he was now satisfied, that they had all along been careful for him, and desired to help him; but they had wanted the opportunity or ability of doing it so soon as they had intended; yet perhaps his godly jealousy over them had made him before fear, lest they were become disaffected or remiss. (Marg. Ref. p—r.)—He did not, however, speak this with respect to the want which he had suffered, as if that were an intolerable evil: for “he had learned” in the school of experience, under the tuition of Christ, “to be contented” and well satisfied with the appointments of God, in whatever situation he was placed. He “knew how to be abased” by the deepest poverty, laboring hard for a mean subsistence, neglected and despised; without repining, or using any dishonorable means of obtaining relief: and he was able “to abound,” without deviating from the strictest rules of temperance and humility, and without growing reluctant to the most self-denying and afflictive labors. In every respect, and in all things, he was “initiated” into the mysterious life of faith and communion with God, as the Source of consolation: so that he “knew how to be full,” and able to impart to others, without being betrayed into inexpedient indulgence, pride, or love of worldly things; or to be hungry, and destitute of bare necessities for himself, without being discomposed, or unfitted for his place and work. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) Thus he found by experience, that he “could do all things,” in this respect, and in whatever was connected with his duty: not by his natural ability, nor yet by the grace which he had already received; but through the strength daily communicated to him from Christ, whose power rested upon him, and enabled him for every service and situation, to which he called him. (Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Eph. 3:14—19. 6:10—13. Col. 1:9—14, v. 11. 1 Tim. 4:6—10, v. 6—8. Heb. 13:5,6.)—He seems to have learned these things, by a deep sense of his own unworthiness, and his obligations to the Lord; by continually contemplating the poverty, abasement, and sufferings of Christ; by a believing confidence in the wisdom, faithfulness, and love of God, who ordered all this concern in the best manner possible; by a lively hope of immortal felicity; and an ardent desire, by any labors or sufferings, to promote the cause of Christ in the world.—It appears to us wonderful, that the apostle, in so affluent a city as Rome, where a flourishing church of Christ had been for a considerable time established, and even after his imprisonment for the gospel had excited very great attention among large multitudes, should want the necessaries or comforts of life. But the Gentiles, in general, were little in the habit of giving to the poor, or contributing to the support of the ministers of religion: and the apostle, like Elisha in respect of Naaman, would be extremely careful not to excite their prejudices, or interrupt the success of the gospel, by his own concerns: so that, probably, it was not generally known, that he was in want. The Christians at Rome, as in other places, were, it may be supposed, chiefly of the lower orders; and they had already to provide for their own pastors, the poor, and the expenses of their religious worship. Yet, after all these considerations have been allowed their full weight; not only the disinterestedness of the apostle, but the inattention, to say no more, of the Christians, cannot but excite our astonishment!—Abased. (12) ‘He who is poor is despised by most men, how much soever he may be adorned with the excellent gifts of God.’ Beza. (Note, Ec. 9:13—18.)—I am instructed.] A reference is made to the initiation of select persons into certain concealed mysteries, among the heathen. There is reason to believe, that these celebrated mysteries contained much evil, and little or no good: but the mystery of the life of faith, submission to God, and reliance on him, was of a higher and nobler nature.

15 Now, ye Philippians, know also, that <sup>c</sup> in the beginning of the gospel, when <sup>d</sup> I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only.

20 Now <sup>s</sup> unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. <sup>t</sup> Amen.

Note.—Though the apostle could well have endured his poverty, without murmuring; he was not on that account, by any means, the less entitled to assistance: and the Philippians had done a good work in communicating with him in his affliction, or partaking of it, by straitening themselves to relieve him. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Note, 1:3—6.) This renewed instance of their liberal affection made it proper for him to mention, what they indeed knew, that at "the beginning of the gospel" being preached among them, when he "departed from Macedonia, no church," except that at Philippi, had maintained Christian fellowship with him, by giving him a supply for his urgent wants, and by his receiving it from them. Even when he was successfully preaching at Thessalonica, and laboring with his own hands for a maintenance, they had repeatedly sent him supplies. (Marg. Ref. c—f.—Notes, 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) This demanded his grateful remembrance: not "because he desired a gift" for its own sake, or coveted the property of his hearers; but because he desired to see them fruitful in those good works, which would conduce to their present comfort, and future felicity: whereas, no doubt, it grieved him to see professed Christians tenacious of their worldly goods, and leaving their ministers to struggle with deep poverty. But, in every respect, he had all that he could wish for; he was fully satisfied with their conduct, and with his own circumstances, "having received from Epaphroditus" the supply which they had sent. This he knew to be far more acceptable to God, than the most fragrant incense, being "a spiritual sacrifice," "well pleasing to him," as the genuine fruit of faith in the Lord Jesus, and love to him. (Marg. Ref. g—n.) The apostle indeed could not make them the return which he wished; but "his God and Father," "whom he was, and whom he served," would surely "supply all their wants" of every kind, according to the riches of his all-sufficiency and bounty; especially by bringing them to his eternal glory through Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. o—r.—Note, 2 Cor. 9:8—11.) To him, therefore, as the common Father of the whole family, he ascribed the glory of all which was done in them, for them, and by them; and of all his manifested perfections, and wonderful works, which the apostle fervently desired might be universally adored for ever and ever. (Marg. Ref. s.)—Nothing could more fully show the peculiar confidence which the apostle had, concerning the Christians at Philippi, (as well as the fervor of his prayer for them,) than this conduct in receiving support from them, and so long after thus acknowledging it. Thessalonica was indeed a larger city than Philippi, but probably the converts to Christianity were poorer; and perhaps they had not been so fully proved, when he was driven from them, as the Philippians had been. (Note, 2 Cor. 8:1—5.)—As Thessalonica was the chief city of Macedonia, at which St. Paul continued some time, it has been supposed that the clause, "when I departed from Macedonia," relates to a supply sent to him, after he was gone into Achaia, distinct from what had been sent him in Thessalonica.—The language used concerning the conduct of the Philippians, being in the most emphatical terms the same which is used concerning the atonement of Christ, (Eph. 5:2.) is wonderful: and it shows how pleasing real good works, "the fruits of the Spirit," are to God through Jesus Christ. Note.—"The brethren" may here either mean the ministers at Rome, or such of the apostle's friends, as were come from other parts to be with him.—There were true "saints in Nero's household;" who kept their places, and served Christ in that most perilous and ensnaring situation, as Daniel did in the court of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius. (Dan. 4:—6:)—It is probable, that they were generally in inferior stations. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Affectionate ministers, like tender parents, can scarcely find words emphatical enough to express their love, and their fervent desires after the felicity of those, whom they regard as their present "joy," and their future "crown." They greatly long after their steadfastness in the faith, and constant devotedness to God, amidst the temptations and allurements of the world: and their good conduct for a season makes them the more earnest with them, to acquit themselves honorably for the future. They so love the blessed office of peace-makers, that they will even supplicate, by name, their own children, to "be of one mind in the Lord:" and they so much desire the success of every good work, that they use all their influence to excite every one "to help all those, who labor" in any way to promote the gospel, and thus give assurance that "their names are written in the book of life." This affectionate spirit should be cultivated, and sought in constant prayer, by all ministers as peculiarly conducive to usefulness.—Believers have always ground of "rejoicing in the Lord," though they are not always able to rejoice: the perfection of their duty, and the full enjoyment of their privilege, are precisely the same: their disconsolations arise from weakness of faith and grace, and they should be called upon to "rejoice in the Lord alway," though they be not able to come up to the standard; that they may aim high: for the nearer they come to it, the more will God be glorified in and by them. Living upon these holy, satisfying, and substantial joys, we should make it appear, that we are not of this world. Let the carnal, the ambitious, and the selfish grasp at the possessions, enjoyments, and parade of a day, and contend about them as children about their toys: our "moderation" about temporal things, and our composure amidst injuries and losses, should be manifest to all men. "The Lord is at hand;" the hour of death, and the day of judgment, will speedily arrive. The transient joys and sorrows of the present scene are not worth our solicitude; all our temporal and eternal interests are in the Lord's hands; we should therefore be "careful for nothing," except to know the state of our souls, and the path of duty. In all our sorrows, fears, wants, or trials, we should "make our requests known unto God:" for, though he knows them beforehand, he loves to hear them from us. (Note, Matt. 6:7,8.) Whatever our difficulties may be, we have always cause to unite grateful praises with our prayers and supplications: and in this way we shall find an inward satisfaction, and experience that "peace of God which passeth all understanding;" so that our hearts and minds will be preserved in serenity, whatever storms may rage around us.—All our privileges and salvation originate wholly from the free mercy of God; yet the actual enjoyment of them is intimately connected with our holy conversation. Therefore, "whatsoever things are true," venerable, just, pure, loving, "lovely, or of good report;" whatsoever is virtuous and commendable; whatsoever prophets, apostles, or martyrs have exemplified; whatsoever excellency we have heard and read of, or witnessed, in the conduct of the saints; nay, whatever things the world, on good grounds, regards and approves as virtuous and commendable: these things we should continually think of, and diligently practise; and in this way we may confidently expect, and shall doubtless experience, the presence and blessing of the God of peace and love, in every circumstance of life and death.

Even those who on the whole prosper in religion, have their winters, as well as their spring-seasons: sometimes their zeal and love seem to languish, and then again at last they "flourish" more abundantly. Yet they often "lack opportunity," when they perhaps are judged inattentive: and faithful ministers may sometimes suspect or mourn over them, when if they knew all, they might be rejoicing greatly in the Lord for them. We should, however, confide in God alone; for human friendships are precarious.—It is a great and exceedingly rare and difficult attainment to "learn in whatever state we are, therewith to be content." Pride, unbelief, a vain hankering after something unpossessed, a fickle, sickly disrelish of present comforts, and the tedious repetition of the same actions and scenes which no longer give pleasure, render men naturally discontented in the most favorable circumstances: and their continual shiftings from one thing to another resemble the tossing to and fro of a man in a fever, who imputes his restlessness to his posture, rather than to his disease. The discontented spirit, then, is the effect of inward disease, not of outward circumstances: and content must spring from inward health of soul, even from holiness. It requires much humility, spirituality, faith, and resignation, to render us contented in our appointed situations. Probably, few Christians, who even enjoy liberty and plenty, can sincerely and unreservedly adopt the language of Paul the indigent prisoner of Jesus Christ. We ought, however, to study this important lesson: we should pray continually for patient submission and hope, when we are abased; for humility and a heavenly mind when exalted; and to be initiated into the practical mystery, of temperate, self-denying, liberal, lowly abundance, or that of cheerful, contented, and honorable indigence, even if called to suffer hunger and extreme want. We can indeed of ourselves "do nothing;" but we may do all things through Christ, who inwardly strengthens his people, in proportion as they simply depend upon him. He can teach and enable his ministers to live in poverty among the affluent, without grudging, envying, coveting, or repining; even when they have an equitable claim upon them for a portion of their abundance. Indeed, we should peculiarly aim at this, if we would be examples to the flock, and convince the wealthy that we "seek not theirs but them."—Notwithstanding this, the people should be taught, that "they do well in communicating to the wants" of their faithful pastors; who are justly entitled to liberal assistance, in proportion as they are willing to "endure all things, rather than hinder the gospel of Christ." (Note, 1 Cor. 9:7—23.) And those who distinguish themselves in such services, from pure motives, shall be "had in everlasting remembrance;" for their most secret good works shall be published at the last day, if not before.—The affectionate servant of Christ will not "desire a gift;" nay, on some occasions he will firmly refuse it, whatever his straits may be: yet, he cannot but long to see his people fruitful in such things, as will "abound to their own account:" and though he be willing to suffer want; yet he must grieve, when they neglect their bounden duty, and bring their state into question, or prevent their own comfort.—Pride, rather than disinterestedness, sometimes induces men, when in actual straits, to refuse or decline such help, as is offered them in the most unexceptionable manner: but still more evidently, it is this evil principle, which makes them unwilling to acknowledge the favors which they have received.—We should not then be reluctant, on proper occasions, to acknowledge our obligations to those, who have ministered to our necessities; and to commend their fruits of faith and love, as "an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice, acceptable, well-pleasing unto God." What we cannot repay, we may trust that he will, "according to his riches in Christ Jesus," supplying all the wants of those who thus straiten themselves, and bringing them to his heavenly kingdom; that glory may be to him, our God and Father, for evermore.—Whether saints reside in palaces, cottages, or dungeons, communion should be maintained among them, by mutual prayers, salutations, and kindnesses. The Lord will have some to honor him in every situation; and he can preserve them unhurt in their proper places, however perilous, by the power which protected the three young men in the fiery furnace: (Notes, Dan. 3:) for "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ" will be with all his true people, wherever dispersed, or however distinguished; and prove eventually "sufficient for them."

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.

COLOSSE was a populous city of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, near to Laodicea and Hie. apolis.—It is not recorded, that St. Paul had been there; and the general testimony of antiquity favors the opinion, that Epaphras, or some other evangelist sent by the apostle from Ephesus, founded the church at Colosse. This sentiment, however, has of late been much controverted. It does not indeed appear to be a matter of much consequence to us; and I am not disposed to enter on so uninteresting a controversy: yet, I must give my decided opinion, that the evidence against the apostle's having been at Colossè is far stronger than any which has been adduced on the affirmative side of the question. There is a great similarity between this epistle, and that to the Ephesians; and it is generally supposed, that they were written about the same time, and sent by the same messenger, even Tychicus: though Onesimus, being a Colossian, who accompanied Tychicus, is not mentioned in the epistle to the Ephesians. (Note, 4:7—14, v. 9.)—It is probable, that the apostle had heard of some teachers, who, grafting heathen philosophy along with the tradition of the Pharisees, on the ritual law of Moses, had corrupted the gospel by this heterogeneous mixture; and were attempting to draw aside the Colossians. He therefore particularly warned them against these deceivers, and against all who, either by superstitious observances, or philosophy, attempted to seduce them from "the simplicity of Christ;" in whom alone, "they were complete," and had every thing which they could possibly want, or imagine, as really conducive to their edification and salvation. These cautions and exhortations are introduced, and connected with the most exalted views of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ, and the fulness and freeness of his salvation; which many suppose to have been directed against some of those heretical sects, which sprang up at an early period in the church; the leaders of which sought to exalt themselves, by derogating from the glory of the divine Saviour.—It appears, however, that the church at Colossè was, on the whole, in a very flourishing state: and accordingly the epistle abounds far more in thanksgivings to God, commendations, and animating exhortations, than in reproofs and warnings.—Epaphras was probably, when the apostle wrote, confined as a prisoner at Rome. (Philem 23.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the saints at Colosse, 1,2; thanks God for the good account, which he had heard from Epaphras, of their faith and love, 3-8; shows, how he prayed for their increasing knowledge, holiness, patience, joy, and gratitude for redeeming love, 9-14; declares in exalted terms the personal and mediatorial glory of Christ, 15-20; by whom they, who were once enemies, were now reconciled to God; and would be eternally saved, if they continued in the faith of the gospel, of which Paul was made a minister, 21-23; who rejoiced in all his labors and sufferings for their sakes, as the apostle of the Gentiles, 24-27; and labored earnestly, "according to the mighty power of God in him;" 28,29.

Note.—(Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 1:5-7. 1 Cor. 1:1-3.) 'Colossæ was situated in Phrygia, not far from Hierapolis and Laodicea; in that part which borders on Lycia and Pamphylia.' Bezæ.—'I cannot think, they are called holy and faithful brethren, on account of their adhering to the purity of the Christian faith, in opposition to those that urged the necessity of observing the Jewish law. This was indeed one instance of their fidelity; but I think it greatly impoverishes and debases the sense of such an extensive phrase, to reduce it within such narrow bounds. Many scores of criticisms of some modern commentators of reputation are liable to the same exception.' Doddridge.—'The author quotes this passage, as exactly conveying his own opinion on several learned expositions, both before and since the time of the pious Doddridge. They give you a bucket of water, and speak as if they had emptied the well.'

al, by assuring the Colossians, that he "gave thanks to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus," for his grace bestowed on them; and prayed for the perfection of that good work in them. This he and Timothy had done, ever since "they heard of their faith and love;" (Note, Eph. 1:15-23.) blessing God, who had called them from the delusive pursuit of earthly things, to hope for happiness in himself. (Marg. Ref. e-i.—Notes, 21-27. 3:1-4. Rom. 5:3-5. 15:8-13. 2 Thes. 2:16,17. Heb. 6:16-20. 1 Pet. 1:3-5. 1 John 3:1-3.) The object of this "hope was laid up in heaven," the place of perfect purity and joy, out of the reach of the vicissitudes of this lower world. It was treasured up "for them," and no enemy could deprive them of it. They had heard of it, "in the word of the truth of the gospel," even the glad tidings of salvation which had been sent to them. It was intended, that this gospel should be published throughout the world; it had made a very rapid progress among the nations; (Marg. Ref. k-m;) and, having been attended by divine power, had brought forth fruit in every place, in the conversion of multitudes to the holy service and spiritual worship of God, by faith in Christ Jesus. The same blessed fruits had been produced in the hearts and lives of the Colossians, "since the day when" they first had heard the gospel, and had truly and experimentally believed it, and been really made partakers of Christ and his salvation. (Marg. Ref. m-o.) These things they had learned from Epaphras, whom the apostle owned as a "dear fellow-servant" in the work of Christ; and "a faithful minister," appointed especially to labor for the good of the Colossians, as their stated pastor. Moreover, he had assured the apostle of their love to Christ, and to him for Christ's sake, which they exercised "in the Spirit," under his influences, and in a spiritual manner: and this made him so confident in respect of their interest in the heavenly "hope" before mentioned. 14 <sup>t</sup> In whom we have redemption through his blood, even <sup>u</sup> the forgiveness of sins:

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Since the time when the apostle had heard, concerning the Christians at Colossè, that they evidently showed their faith in Christ and faithfulness to him, by their "love to all the saints" (2), he and his fellow-laborers "had not ceased to pray for them." He especially requested that they might "be filled," or completely endued, "with the knowledge of the will" of God, both in respect of his method of saving sinners, and of their duties to him and to all men, as his redeemed servants: that they might understand the import and spiritual extent of his commandments; and how to obey them, in the several relations, situations, and offices, which they sustained in the church, and in the community, and by the improvement of their different talents: that they might know how to apply general rules, to their own particular cases; and so do the work of Christ assigned to each of them, in the best manner, from the purest motives, and with the happiest effect. (Marg. Ref. t—y.—Notes, Ps. 119:26—34,66,133.) Thus they would proceed "in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;" with sagacity, and prudent discernment of seasons and opportunities; distinguishing between real excellency, and all deceitful appearances; wisely attending to their duties in the most inoffensive and engaging manner; without affording their enemies any advantage, or losing opportunities of usefulness out of timidity, or failing of success through want of caution and discretion. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, 3:16,17. 4:5,6. Matt. 10:16—18, v. 16. Luke 21:12—19, v. 15. Rom. 16:17—20. Eph. 5:15—20, vv. 15—18. Jam. 1:5—8. 3:13—18.) He was desirous of this especially, that they might habitually behave in a manner "worthy of" that glorious and holy Lord, whose servants and worshippers they were: not dishonoring him and his cause by any inconsistency or impropriety of conduct; but acting as it became persons so highly favored and divinely instructed: and that their conduct might in all respects be "well-pleasing" to him: while "fruitfulness," in every good work was connected with a still further "increase in the knowledge of God," and of the glory and harmony of his perfections, and a happy experience of his consolations. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Notes, Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:9—11,27—30. 1 Thes. 2:9—12.)—He likewise "prayed," that the Colossians might be most abundantly "strengthened" in all the graces of the new nature, with an energy suited to their utmost need; according to "the glorious power" of God, by which he converted, upheld, and comforted believers, "to the praise of his glory:" that so they might be enabled to bear all tribulations and persecutions with patient submission, persevering constancy, meekness of long-suffering, and joy in the Lord: while, amidst all trials, they "gave thanks to the Father of our Lord Jesus," whose special grace had "made them meet to be partakers of the inheritance" provided for the saints, in the world of perfect light, knowledge, holiness, and happiness; at a distance from all ignorance, error, sin, temptation, fear, and sorrow. (Marg. Ref. e—i.)—As believers, they were even then called "to walk in the light;" and, compared with the condition of unconverted men, their situation might well be thus distinguished: yet, when the state of glory was spoken of, into which the spirits of the departed brethren had entered, they were still in comparative darkness. (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:8—14. 1 Thes. 5:4—11. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.) They had, however, obtained a portion in that inheritance; and their holy desires, spiritual affections, and capacity for delighting in the work and worship of God; especially their love to the Lord Jesus Christ, and his glorious salvation, constituted "a meetness for that inheritance," and all its joys and employments, and a sure evidence that God intended to bring them to it. (Marg. Ref. k-m.—Notes, Rev. 5:8—14. 7:13—17.) For, in order to effect this change in them, he had "rescued them from the power of darkness," the empire of Satan, the prince of darkness, of ignorance, delusion, vice, enmity, and misery, whose blind and abject slaves they had formerly been; and he had translated them into the kingdom of righteousness, of liberty, of light, and holiness, of love and felicity, which he had constituted under "his dear Son," or the "Son of his love;" (Notes, Matt. 3:2,16,17.) by faith in whom they enjoyed this redemption, as the purchase of his atoning blood: and thus forgiveness of sins, and all other spiritual blessings, were vouchsafed to them. (Marg. Ref. o-t.—Notes, Acts 26:16—18. Eph. 1:3—12. Tit. 2:14.)—The apostle joined himself and the Jewish converts along with the Gentiles in these things: and doubtless all are the subjects of the prince of darkness, of whatever nominal religion they are, till inward conversion translates them into the kingdom of Christ. (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. John 8:41—47. Eph. 2:1—3. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 John 5:19. Rev. 12:7—12.) And to interpret it of the deliverance of the Gentile converts from idolatry, and of the happy state of the Jewish converts, as "the saints in light," is totally to enervate this highly animated passage.—The "glorious power," here spoken of, is sometimes ascribed to the Father, or to God absolutely; sometimes to the Holy Spirit, and frequently to Christ. For "these Three are one." (Notes, Ps. 138:3. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Eph. 3:14—19, v. 16. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13.)

16 For <sup>a</sup> by him were all things created, that are <sup>b</sup> in heaven, and that are in earth, visible, and invisible, whether they be <sup>c</sup> thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created <sup>d</sup> by him, and for him.

17 And <sup>e</sup> he is before all things, <sup>f</sup> and by him all things consist.

Note.—Having mentioned Christ, as the "dear Son" of God, or "the Son of his love" (13), the apostle here explained more fully the import of that expression. He declared him to be "the Image of the Invisible God." (Marg. Ref. v, x.—Notes, 2 Cor. 4:3—6. Heb. 1:1—4.) Being possessed of all divine perfections, as "One with the Father;" he appeared on earth, displaying those perfections, and performing all divine operations, through the medium of the human nature. Thus, he made the invisible God known to mankind, as his "express Image;" he represented the Father, and manifested his glory. In and through him, as "God manifest in the flesh," sinners, believing "the sure testimony of God," might know, approach, trust, and worship him with acceptance; which otherwise they could not have done.—It seems evident that Christ is not called "the Image of God," in respect of his divine nature, as many, especially the ancient expositors, supposed; and so by their illustrations, weakened or perplexed the argument for his real Deity: for the divine essence is no more visible in the Person of the Son, than in that of the Father; and therefore the One cannot be "the Image," or visible representation, of the other. (Note, 1 Tim. 6:13—16.) But the Person of Christ, as God in human nature, is the visible, or sensible, discovery of the invisible God; and "he that hath seen him hath seen the Father." (Notes, John 12:44—50. 14:7—14, v. 9. 15:22—25.)—The apostle further declared Christ to be "the First-born of the whole creation;" for so the words may be literally rendered. Christ is called the "First-begotten," or "Only begotten," of the Father; and it has been shown, that these expressions must be understood, of the mysterious union in the sacred Trinity, and the relation of the second Person to the first in the divine subsistence; for the grand display of the love of God to the world consisted, in "giving his own Son" to become man, in order to die for our sins; rather than in giving him, when incarnate, to death for us. The expression here used seems to be of the same import: he was qualified to be "the Image of the invisible God" to men, by reason of his original and essential glory. (Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, John 1:14,18. 1 John 4:9—12.) Existing, as the co-eternal Son of the Father, before the creation of the world; he appeared as the "First-begotten Son of God," to be "the Heir of all things," when they were called into existence, as the first-born is the heir of the estate or kingdom. The reason, or proof, adduced by the apostle, demonstrates, that he meant the words in this sense; "for," says he, "by him all things were created." He then proceeds to mention all creatures in heaven and earth: and by the terms of "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers," clearly including the highest created dignity and exaltation, he evidently intended to declare, in the most emphatical terms, that every creature of God, however distinguished, was created by Christ, as one in Deity and operation with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Nay, he added, that they were all "created for him," for the display of his glory, and to do him service: (*Marg. Ref. a—d.—Notes, Prov. 8:22—33. 16:4. Is. 42:8,9. 44:24. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Note, Rom. 11:33—36.)—It is perhaps impossible to use stronger language, to express creating and upholding Power, universal Sovereignty, and real Deity, than is here employed; to which the Socinians can only say that it is all figurative, and means no more than the introduction of the gospel-dispensation, as a kind of new creation: but nothing can be more absurd. Or they may say, that the apostle was mistaken: and to such obstinate infidelity we oppose the demonstrative evidences, of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. In fact, we find language in some respects similar almost in every part of the New Testament.—It should also be observed, that, however we may interpret the expression, "The First-born of every creature," no man can infer from it, that Christ is a sort of supra-angelic creature, (according to the inconsistent opinion of the Arians,) without expressly opposing St. Paul's inference from his own doctrine, or rather the argument by which he confirms it; in which he evidently shows, that he meant Christ was before, above, and distinct from all creatures; yea, the Author, Proprietor, and Supporter, of all ranks and orders of them in the universe.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The same glorious Person, of whose original majesty such sublime language had been employed, was next declared to be "the Head of the body, the church." This manifestly related to his mediatorial character, which he voluntarily assumed, and sustained in human nature. (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, 2:10,18,19. 1 Cor. 12:15—31. Eph. 1:15—23. 4:14—16.) He is also "the Beginning," the Author and Source of spiritual and eternal life to man, "the Resurrection and the life," both of body and soul: and "the First-born from the dead;" the first who rose to die no more; the First-fruits of his people, who rose to inherit the mediatorial throne, as their Surety and for their benefit. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Notes, John 11:20—27, vv. 25,26. 14:4—6, v. 6. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Rev. 3:14—16.) So that it was evidently intended, that "in all things he should have the pre-eminence," over all worlds, and in all respects; as to creation, providence, redemption, essential dignity, universal sovereignty, assumed and delegated authority, personal excellency, and the display of Omnipotence; as the Conqueror of "death, and of him that had the power of death;" (Note, Heb. 2:14,15.) both in the world and in the church; above all creatures visible and invisible; during time and to eternity. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) For "it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell." It seemed good to him, that all the plenitude of divine power, authority, wisdom, knowledge, holiness, justice, truth, mercy, grace, even all "the fulness of God," should dwell in the Person of Christ; and be exercised and communicated, through his human nature, by virtue of the union of the Deity and humanity in his mysterious Person; that believers, from his fulness, might receive the rich supply of their various and urgent wants. (Marg. Ref. l.—Note, John 1:16.) Thus "it pleased all Fulness," the original, infinite, inexhaustible Fulness of Being and perfection, or of the Deity, "to dwell in" Christ, for the benefit of his church; (Note, 2:8,9.) that, "having made peace," or laid the foundation of an honorable reconciliation of sinners, of every age and nation, to himself, "by the blood of his cross," and the satisfaction there made to divine justice; he might actually effect that reconciliation, both in respect of "things in heaven, and things on earth." (Note, Eph. 1:9—12.) "The spirits of just men" then in heaven, owed their reconciliation to the Saviour's undertaking for them: and all on earth, whether Jews or Gentiles, who believed in Christ, were reconciled unto God through their union with him, and their interest in the atonement of his blood. (Note, Rom. 3:21—26.) Thus the whole became one church and one body in him: and they all will at length be translated to heaven, there to continue for ever in a state of perfect reconciliation to God, and friendship with him and each other. This seems to be what is meant by "all things in heaven and earth;" for, though holy angels become one family through Christ with redeemed sinners; yet they cannot be said to be reconciled unto God, as they never were in a state of enmity against him. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, Rom. 5:7—10. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Eph. 2:14—18.)—Some commentators would wholly confine the meaning, to man's being reconciled to God and his service; others explain it wholly of God's being reconciled to his offending creatures: but why should not both be included? For the atonement of Christ procured for all believers both pardon of sin and new-creating grace: that they might walk with God, in a state of mutual peace, and reciprocal friendship and love.

Note.—The Colossians, among others, had been called to share these blessings. They were once "alienated" from God and his service, yea, "enemies to him in their minds," which had been manifested by their wicked works;" so that they had justly merited to be treated as enemies: yet, by his rich mercy in Christ Jesus, they were now brought into a state of reconciliation. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 8:5—9.) This had been effected "in the body of his flesh;" in the body which he assumed of our nature, that he might be capable of sufferings and death, as a Sacrifice to divine justice for the sins of men. In consequence of this, the gospel had been preached to them, and they were induced to believe it: thus they were justified "by faith, and had peace with God, through Jesus Christ;" and were also brought to love and serve God, by a mutual and cordial reconciliation: (Note, Rom. 5:1,2.) the intent of which was, that they should at length be presented before God so perfectly holy, as to be "unblamable and unreprouvable" even "in his sight," their sanctification being rendered as complete, as their justification had been when they believed. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Note, Eph. 5:22—27.) This would certainly be the case with every one, who continued in the profession and exercise of faith, like a building that is grounded and settled on a firm foundation; (Notes, 2:5—7. Matt. 7:24—27. Eph. 3:14—19.) and so was not, by fear of man, or by any delusion or temptation, "moved away from the hope of" eternal life, according to the truth of the gospel, which they had heard.—The Lord had commanded that this gospel should be "preached to every creature under heaven," and it had actually been published very widely, among Jews and Gentiles, without distinction of nation, or previous character; and of this gospel St. Paul had been made a minister and an apostle. (Marg. Ref. t—z, and on 6.) He uses a general term, "under heaven," commonly employed on similar occasions; the import of which may be learned from other places. (Marg. Ref. a.)—This last verse may be rendered, "Since ye continue, &c." implying a confidence of the sincerity of the Colossians, as evidenced by their steadfastness. But our translation is more obvious and literal; and perfectly consistent with the apostle's doctrine concerning perseverance: for many specious professors of true religion are "moved away from the hope of the gospel," "having no root in themselves;" fear of coming short is one grand means of the true believer's perseverance; and it was frequently the apostle's manner, by such intimations, to caution his readers to beware of deceiving themselves.—Mind, &c. (21)—In the higher powers of the soul, the intellect and reasoning faculty, as well as the will and affections, man is, "an enemy to God;" so vain is the notion, that the opposition of reason to the sensual appetites, is the conflict "between flesh and spirit," of which the apostle elsewhere discourses! (Notes, Rom. 7:12—25. Gal. 5:16—18.)

but the blessed effects of his ministry among them, and that of those who concurred with him in it, caused him to rejoice in all that he endured for their sakes: (Notes, Eph. 3:13. Phil. 2:14--18.) for he thus "filled up that which was behind of the afflictions of Christ." The sufferings of Christ perfectly sufficed for the redemption of "his body the church," and were an atonement of infinite value: nor could those of the apostle, in any measure, have made up the deficiency if there had been any. But the atonement of Christ must be received. It is received by faith; "faith comes by hearing;" hearing by preaching; and preaching was in those days inseparable from suffering: so that the apostle's sufferings in his flesh, for the benefit of the church, were necessary in their place, and could not be dispensed with. (Notes, Rom. 10:12--17. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. 2 Tim. 2:8--13.) By them he "filled up what was behind of the afflictions of Christ;" as the sufferings of martyrs, confessors, and believers in general, form one aggregate of pain and distress, with those of the Head of the church, all of which is conducive and necessary, in different ways, to the complete salvation of the whole body. But the apostle might with the more propriety say this; as he suffered in the same cause, from the same persons, or those of the same character, in the same meek and patient manner, and from the same spirit of zeal and love, with his divine Master: so that his afflictions resembled those of the Saviour in every thing, except that the Saviour's alone were expiatory. (Marg. Ref.) Christ is also represented, as sympathizing in the sufferings of his disciples: and many think, the apostle had in view, the words, with which the Lord addressed him, in the way to Damascus: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" In this sense the sufferings of every part of the Lord's mystical body, are his sufferings: the former sense, however, appears by far the most suitable to the tenor of the passage. (Notes, 18--20. Eph. 1:15--23.)

Note.—St. Paul had been made a minister of the gospel, according to the sovereign appointment of God, in his gracious dealings, with him, and the stewardship of it committed to him; that he might "fulfil" the prophecies of the scripture; in preaching to the Gentiles, and bringing them into the church. Thus he was employed to "make known that mystery," which had been hidden from men, during all preceding ages and generations of the world; but was at length manifestly revealed to the holy followers of Christ. (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, Rom. 16:25--27. Eph. 3:1--12.) For to them it had pleased God to make known the immense abundance of his mercy and grace, as well as the glory of all his perfections, in this "mystery among the Gentiles." Not only was Christ, the promised Messiah, "God manifest in the flesh," preached among the Gentiles; (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) not only did he reign among them: but he actually dwelt in the hearts of true believers; "in" the hearts of multitudes of the Gentiles, by faith, and the power of his Spirit, implanting his love, renewing his image, and writing his law; which fully sealed and warranted their hope of eternal glory. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Notes, Gal. 2:17--21, v. 20. Eph. 3:14--19, v. 17.)—Indeed, it cannot be made intelligible, how "Christ among the Gentiles," according to the interpretation of some learned expositors, could give individuals a warranted "hope of glory." might draw them into any inconsistent conduct: and they "instructed every man in all wisdom," and in every thing, which could render them "wise unto salvation," or wise to serve God in their several places. For they desired and aimed "to present every man," who attended on their ministry, "complete in Christ," perfectly justified, and at length perfectly sanctified. (Marg. Ref. o-t. Notes, 21—23. 2 Cor. 11:1—6.) In this, the apostle labored with unwearied diligence; "striving" by every means to bring sinners to Christ, and believers to establishment and holiness: yet this assiduity and earnestness were not of himself; but according to the "working" of a divine power on his soul, which "wrought mightily in him;" exciting fervent desires after God and the salvation of souls; communicating vigor to all holy affections; raising him above all low and selfish aims; and supporting him in constancy, patience, and cheerful fortitude, amidst all difficulties and persecutions. Some would explain this power, to mean exclusively the miracles which the apostle wrought; but every one must perceive, that this wholly destroys the energy and darkens the sense of the passage. #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

All spiritual blessings, "from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ," belong to "the saints and faithful brethren in Christ," wherever they are dispersed. May we be found of that number!—We are bound in love and duty to thank God for those, who show "their faith in Christ, by love to all his saints;" and also to pray heartily for them, (though they be not personally known to us,) when we hear a good account of them; for in these things, "the communion of saints" principally consists.—The hope of real Christians is "laid up for them in heaven," out of the reach of enemies and disappointments; they have been called to partake of it, by "the word of the truth of the gospel;" and, blessed be God, the joyful message is "come to us" in this far distant region!—If we have "known the grace of God in truth," it "bringeth forth fruit," in our holy lives and spiritual worship; but if it has in no degree this effect on us, it will only aggravate our condemnation. This may be learned from "all the fellow-servants" of our common Lord, who faithfully minister in different parts of his church: for they all declare, that "love in the spirit," love of Christ, of holiness, and of the people, ordinances, and commandments of God, and the unreserved obedience of love, are inseparable from saving faith.

V. 9—14.

It is not enough that we understand the grand outlines of divine truth: but we should also pray for ourselves, and for one another, while we use diligently all proper means, that we may be "perfected in the knowledge of the Lord's will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;" in order that we may "walk worthy of our vocation," please God in every part of our conduct, and produce every kind of holy fruit in abundance. (Note, 1 Thes. 4:1—5.) Thus we shall likewise "increase in the knowledge of God:" for a humble, upright, teachable, and spiritual mind exceedingly helps the exercise of a sound judgment, in investigating the nature and perfections of God; and experience confirms the knowledge, which faith receives from divine revelation. (Note, 2 Pet. 3:17,18.) This again tends to increasing simplicity in dependence on God, which brings strength into the soul; that, being invigorated with "all might according to his glorious power," the believer may be able to exercise "patience and long-suffering with joyfulness," under the most severe and long-continued trials and provocations. Indeed, we may well be very joyful and thankful to the "Father," if we have "the witness in ourselves," (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.) that "we are made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light;" having acquired a relish for those contemplations, and that holy worship, society, and felicity, in which the blessed spirits before the throne are incessantly engaged. (Notes, Rev. 4:6—11. 5:8—14. 7:9—17.)—Alas! "the whole world lieth under" "the power of darkness," and is the kingdom of the prince of darkness, except as divine grace rescues some from this destructive bondage, by "translating them into the kingdom of the beloved son of God, in whom they have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins," without which there can be no salvation. The subjects of these two kingdoms, with their respective rulers, will shortly be removed to an eternal and unchangeable state; Christ and his people being collected together in heavenly felicity, Satan and his slaves being cast into outer darkness and despair. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. Rev. 20:11—15.) When these things are duly considered, we shall account it so immense a favor to be delivered from the kingdom of the devil, and translated into that of Christ, that we shall know ourselves to have unspeakable cause for gratitude, in the deepest scenes of adversity, and amidst the sharpest conflicts of temptation. For our trials will soon terminate, and we shall speedily find ourselves among those "that are come out of great tribulations," and are singing the praises of him, "who has washed them from their sins in his own blood."

When admitted into heaven, and not before, we shall have some adequate conceptions of "the great mystery of godliness;" and shall understand, in another manner than we now do, the import of the apostle's energetic language, concerning the Lord Jesus, "the Image of the invisible God," "the First-born" of the whole creation; the universal Creator, Sustainer, Proprietor, and Lord of heaven and earth, of men and angels, of the visible and invisible world, and of all the hierarchies of cherubim and seraphim before the throne of God; all of which "were created by him and for him, and he is before all things, and by him all things consist." Let us then at present adore these mysteries, in humble faith: and, instead of wanting material images "of the invisible God," or framing gross notions of him in our creative imagin-tion, or vain speculations; let us contemplate the glory of our God in Christ Jesus, "the express Image" of his essential excellency. Here we may learn humble confidence, reverential fear, and filial love; and be prepared for spiritual worship, joyful communion with God, and growing conformity to his holiness; as dwelling in our nature, reconciling the world unto himself, "the Beginning" of our life, "the First-born from the dead;" "that in all things he might have the pre-eminence." Here we may become acquainted with the harmoniously glorious perfections of our God; and may approach him, and have fellowship with him, notwithstanding our exceedingly great guilt and pollution and infirmity. For it has pleased the infinitely glorious God, that "all fulness should dwell in Christ," both to relieve our weak apprehensions, and our guilty consciences; in our discoveries of his glorious majesty and holiness, through so encouraging a medium, as the Person of Emmanuel; "making peace by the blood of his cross;" and reconciling all things in heaven and on earth, to himself and to each other, in this most gracious and astonishing manner.

V. 21—29.

If we be convinced, that once we were "alienated from God, and enemies in our minds by wicked works;" and if we are now reconciled to him, by the incarnation, sacrifice, and grace of Christ: we shall not attempt to explain away, or presumptuously expect to comprehend, these deep mysteries: but we shall see a glory and suitableness in this plan of redemption, as uniting the honor of the divine law and government, with the hope of guilty, perishing sinners; though much yet remains far above and out of the reach of our low capacities, and feeble conceptions of spiritual things: and, while we long to be "presented, holy, unblamable, and unprovable in the sight of God;" it will be impossible for us to abuse or pervert his grace, to encourage ourselves in sin. Many things indeed must try the faith of professed Christians: but every trial which we stand, and every temptation which we resist, without "being moved away from the hope of the gospel;" and every event which shows that we "continue in the faith, grounded and settled;" tends to assure us, that we shall soon "be presented faultless before our God with exceeding joy." (Notes, Jude 20—25.) May this gospel then be successfully "preached to every creature that is under heaven." May numbers of ministers, like St. Paul, be raised up and sent forth, who may even "rejoice in their sufferings" for the cause of Christ, and after his example; and may we all remember that our afflictions, when properly supported, conduce to the glory of God, our own salvation, and the benefit of "the body of Christ." Let us be thankful, that God has revealed to us those mysteries, "which were hid from ages and generations;" and has shown "the riches of his glory among us Gentiles." But, let it be observed, that these things can even under the full light of the gospel be known by his saints alone. "The secret of the Lord is still with them that fear him;" and we need not wonder to hear learned, ingenious, and very sagacious men betray their ignorance of these mysteries; when we reflect on their pride, carnal mind, and evident contempt of the humbling doctrine of the cross, nay, their enmity against it. As Christ is preached among us, let us seriously inquire, whether he dwells and reigns in us; which alone can warrant our assured hope of his glory. This all ministers should "preach, warning every man, and instructing every man in all wisdom; that they may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." May we then, every one of us, thus labor with all earnestness, and by every method endeavor to promote the cause of Christ; and be careful to "strive according to that working, which worketh mightily" in those who simply depend on it and pray for it; and may we go forth in the strength and victorious energy of "the Lord almighty," to do his work and seek his glory, in the services of our several stations. Especially let us rely on it, and earnestly pray for it, both to animate and qualify us, and to render our labors successful, if employed in the arduous but blessed work of the sacred ministry; and to animate, strengthen, and prosper all ministers, and especially all missionaries, in every region of the earth.

CHAP. II.

The apostle shows, how earnestly he prayed for the Colossians, and the churches which had not seen him; that they might be united in love, and thus comforted; and that they might attain to a clear knowledge of the mysteries of Christ, and not be seduced by deceivers, 1—4. He rejoices, as if he saw "their order, and the steadfastness of their faith;" and exhorts them to perseverance and thankfulness, 5—7; warning them against vain philosophy and human traditions; and showing that they were complete in Christ, 8—10; having in him the true circumcision, of which baptism was the external sign, 11—13. For God "had quickened them with Christ," having forgiven their sins, and abolished the law of ordinances, by his cross, 14; on which he triumphed over principalities and powers, 15. They ought not then to submit to legal impositions, which were shadows of Christ, 16, 17; nor be induced, by vain pretences, to worship angels, or to any other observances of voluntary humility, will worship, and self-imposed austerity, 18—23.

Note.—The apostle was desirous, that the Christians at Colossæ should know, what earnest longings he had experienced, and what vigorous endeavors and fervent prayers he had made for them, and the Christians of Laodicea, and all other churches, which had never seen him, in order to promote their spiritual welfare. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) He especially wrestled most earnestly with God in prayer, that their hearts might be encouraged by divine consolations, in every part of their duty; and that, in order to this, they might be united together in the most perfect love of one another: that so all envies, resentments, suspicions, and competition, might be excluded; which would otherwise certainly burden their consciences, inflame their passions, “grieve the Holy Spirit,” and interrupt their comfort. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, 3:12—15. Eph. 4:1—6,14—16,30—32. Phil. 2:1—4.) In this most cordial union, he prayed that they might attain and possess all those spiritual riches, which were to be found in the distinct, complete, and satisfactory understanding of the gospel of Christ, for this would exclude all doubt and hesitation, being connected with the “full assurance of faith” and “hope:” (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Notes, Heb. 6:11,12. 10:19—22. 2 Pet. 1:10,11.) that so they might confidently acknowledge, and profess their belief of “the mystery of God, even of the Father and of Christ,” his beloved Son, as One with him, according to “the great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh;” (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) “in whom” (or in which mystery) were “hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.” These treasures were indeed hidden from the eyes of unbelievers: but the infinite wisdom and knowledge of God were more displayed in the Person and redemption of Christ, than in all his other works. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, Eph. 3:1—12.) All true wisdom and knowledge consisted in a believing and practical and experimental understanding of these mysteries, and such instructions as are deducible from them: yea, from this treasury all true wisdom and knowledge must be derived by faith and prayer; and all science or philosophy contrary to this are worthless. (Notes, Matt. 11:25—27. John 1:16. 1 Cor. 1:20—31. 2:6—9.) This the apostle insisted on, “lest any man should beguile them” into some specious delusion, by enticing words, or persuasive reasonings; such as plausible orators use frequently, for the purpose of imposing on the judgment by addressing the passions; or by assuming as true, what is specious indeed, but false: as if either heathen sages, or Jewish scribes, could teach any wisdom preferable to the mysteries of the gospel, or in any degree adding ought to it. (Note, 8—10.) ‘It grieved the apostle to think, how ‘incapable he was rendered of serving them, ‘otherwise than by his letters and prayers. ‘Oh! that such language might inspire every ‘minister who reads it, with a desire to use his ‘liberty to the best purposes, and to exert himself, as under such confinement he would wish

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle, “though absent in body, was present in spirit” with the Colossians: he greatly interested himself in their concerns, and realized to his mind the prosperous state of their church, as made known to him by Epaphras. (Notes, 1:3—8. 1 Cor. 5:1—5.) Some think, that he had an immediate revelation concerning it; as Elisha had of Gehazi’s conduct in following Naaman. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:26,27. 6:8—12.) By that view, however, which he had of their prosperous state, he was filled with joy and complacency; as if he had witnessed the orderly management, both of their private concerns, and of those of the church, as to the regularity and discipline maintained in it, and the steadfastness of their faith in Christ, notwithstanding the terrors of persecution, and the artifices of false teachers. (Marg. Ref. o—q.) As therefore they had, by faith, “received Christ Jesus” to be their Lord and Saviour, according to the several offices which he sustained for the benefit of his church, (Notes, John 1:10—12. 1 John 5:11, 12.) let them continue in habitual dependence on him and obedience to him: let them seek all their wisdom, strength, hope, holiness, and

Note.—It was especially requisite for the Christians at Colossè to be upon their guard, that no man might “rob them” (as victorious armies plunder the vanquished,) of their hope and comfort, or turn them aside from Christ, by philosophical subtleties, and vain delusive speculations, which were opposed to the simple faith of the gospel. These were “traditions of men,” which were delivered from the heads and teachers of the several sects of philosophers, and so handed down from age to age: and they formed “the elements,” or first principles, of a supposed wisdom, suited to the proud, curious, speculating, and carnal temper of the world; but which was totally incompatible with the doctrine of Christ.—The Judaizing teachers seem to have blended their system, with speculations borrowed from the Pagans, and their different sects of philosophers: thus the traditions of the sages, and those of the Pharisees, were incorporated; and the “worldly elements” of heathen superstition or philosophy, were blended with legal and traditionary external observances. Unless something of this kind be supposed, it will be found difficult to understand the apostle’s discourse: for he spoke of philosophical delusions and legal ceremonies at the same time; he argued against both of them at once; but he levelled his reasonings chiefly against the Judaizing teachers. (Marg. Ref. z—c.—Notes, Matt. 15:1—6.)—To what he had before advanced, he here added, that “in Christ all the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily.” In the temple the Lord discovered his presence by the Shechinah, or “visible glory;” yet this was only an emblem, or shadow, of his gracious presence: but in Christ “the fulness of the Deity dwells bodily,” or substantially, and all the divine perfections are exercised by Christ, as “God manifested in the flesh,” through the mysterious Union of the divine and human nature in one Person. When the apostle spoke of believers being “filled with all the fulness of God;” (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.) he evidently meant it of their receiving a rich abundance of all divine communications from God; and his indwelling in his people refers to his gracious and powerful presence with them. But “all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily” in Christ, is language unspeakably stronger, and evidently refers to his being constituted the repository of all spiritual blessings, from whose fulness all believers receive. (Notes, John 1:14—16.) For God, dwelling in human nature as in a temple, exercises all divine perfections, performs all divine operations, and communicates all benefits to man, through that medium. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, 1—4, v. 3. 1:15—20. John 5:20—23. 14:18—20. 2 Cor. 5:18—21.)—“Christ is not here said to be “filled with ‘all the fulness of God:’” ... but the whole fulness of the Godhead is said to reside in him. Now θειοτης and το θειον, never signify the ‘gifts of God, or the doctrine of the gospel;’ but the divine nature only; nor can the will or ‘revelation of God be said to “dwell bodily” in ‘any person.’ Whitby.—If the union of Deity and Manhood in one person can be expressed in human language, without doubt this verse does express it. 10 And ye are <sup>h</sup>complete in him, which is <sup>i</sup>the Head of all principality and power:

Note.—As Christ was completely qualified for his mediatorial work, by “all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him bodily;” so believers are completely supplied with all they want, by their mystical union with him. “They have been completed in him;” being “in him,” as members of his mystical body, and as quickened by his Spirit; he is “made of God to them Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption;” all their instruction, acceptance, holiness, deliverance, liberty, victory, and happiness, are derived from him by faith, in the use of his appointed means; and they want nothing, which they have not in him. They therefore can have no need to seek any additional instruction, wisdom, help, or encouragement, either from Jewish ordinances and traditions, or from heathen sages.—As Christ is also “the head of all principality and power;” all angels being his willing servants, and the whole creation being subjected to him; so Christians have no cause to fear any creatures, or reason to seek help from them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. 8:28—39. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Eph. 1:15—23. Phil. 2:9—11. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.)—The Judaizing teachers seem to have imbibed, and new modelled, the Pagan notions of subordinate deities; and, applying it to the scriptural doctrine of angels, to have introduced the mediatorial worship of them; with which they, at an early period, attempted to corrupt the Christian church, and not wholly without success. To this the apostle here evidently refers, as well as in what is said afterwards. (Note, 20—23.) But Christians could have no occasion to pay homage of any kind to those creatures, who, however exalted, were subjected to Christ their Lord and Redeemer.

Note.—The disciples of Jesus did not want the external seal of circumcision, in order to their acceptance, or complete salvation: for “in Christ” and by their union with him, they had the “true circumcision,” which was not performed on their bodies by the hands of men, but on their hearts by the Holy Spirit; and in consequence of this regeneration, they were daily employed in “putting off the body of the sins of the flesh.” Thus they renounced and watched against all the sins, to which their natural corrupt propensities excited them; and they had “crucified the old man,” as propagated from Adam, whence all these evil lustings originated. This was the “true circumcision,” which Christ himself performed on the hearts of his people, by his Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, Deut. 10:16. 30:1—10. Jer. 4:3,4. 9:25,26. Deut. 7:51—53. Rom. 2:25—29. 6:5—10. Gal. 5:19—26. Phil. 3:1—7.)

For “the circumcision of Christ,” seems rather to signify his work in the believer’s soul, than his own personal circumcision: though that was a part of his mediatorial humiliation, by which the true circumcision was procured for them, and in which they are rendered conformable to him. (Marg. Ref. n.) Instead of the outward sign of circumcision, baptism had been substituted; which some suppose to be meant by “the circumcision of Christ:” this represented that death and burial with him, from former confidences, and sinful and worldly pursuits, which true Christians experience, in order to their being made conformable to him in his resurrection. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, 3:1—4. Rom. 6:3,4. 1 Pet. 3:21,22. 4:1,2.)—The baptism of Jews and Gentiles, when converted to Christianity, implied their ‘death unto sin and new birth unto righteousness;’ their entrance into the church and kingdom of Christ; the washing away of the guilt and pollution of their sins; and their dedication to the service of God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, in whose name, as the God of their salvation, they were baptized. (Note, Matt. 28: 19,20, v. 19.) The same inward change had been signified by circumcision, which was administered to adult proselytes, and then to their infant-offspring: so that no argument can hence be deduced against the baptism of infants. (Notes, Gen. 17:9—12. Rom. 4:9—12.)—This conformity to the crucified and risen Saviour was effected, “through the faith of the operation of God, who raised him from the dead;” or, by a believing reliance on that effectual saving power of God, as displayed in the resurrection of Christ. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Note, Eph. 1:15—23.) It is, no doubt, an important scriptural truth, that the faith, by which we receive all other blessings, is itself the gift and work of God; (Notes, John 1:10—13. Eph. 2:4—10.) and this has induced some expositors, and very many preachers, to explain the clause to mean, ‘the faith which God has wrought in the heart.’ This was the author’s view, when he wrote the first edition of this work. But a careful examination of the subject has convinced him, that this is rather imposing a sense on the apostle’s words, than inquiring after the true meaning of them. The ablest Greek scholars are decided, that the idiom of the language will not admit of that construction: and certainly there is no instance in the New Testament, in which a similar mode of expression can fairly be thus interpreted. (Mark 11:22. Acts 3:16. Rom. 3:22,26. Gal. 2:16,20. 3:22. Eph. 3:12. Phil. 1:27. 3: 9. 2 Thes. 2:13. Jam. 2:1. Rev. 2:13. 14:12. Gr.) It should however be observed, that though the clause does not affirm faith to be the work and gift of God, it neither teaches nor implies any thing to the contrary. Indeed, this is taught in the subsequent verse. (Notes, 13—15, v. 13. John 3:1—8. Tit. 2:4—7. Jam. 1:16—18. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.)

Note.—The church at Colossè, consisting chiefly of converts from idolatry, had not only been “dead in their sins,” but in that carnal state of which “the uncircumcision of their flesh” was an outward token: yet God had “quickenèd them together with Christ,” by virtue of his resurrection; having, in his death, provided for the forgiveness of all their transgressions, to the full benefit of which he had thus admitted them. (Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, 3:1—4. Eph. 2:1—13.) For Christ had “blotted out the hand-writing of ordinances,” the ceremonial law, which was, as it were, the bond of the ancient church for payment of the debt of sin, contracted by violation of the moral law; but which Christ the Surety had paid by his all-sufficient atonement, and so blotted out the debt. This “hand-writing was against” the Jews, and contrary to them, as well as to the Gentiles: for it is observable that the apostle changed the person, when he came to speak on this subject, saying “against us,” not you. (Notes, Matt. 5:17,18. John 1:17. Eph. 2:14—18. Heb. 7:18,19. 8:7—13. 9:1—14, 18—23. 10:1—18.) Not only was the ritual law a heavy yoke for them to bear; (Note, Acts 15:7—11.) but all its sacrifices and ablutions testified, that they were guilty and polluted: yet these typical expiations could not take away sins. So that the bond could never have been discharged, except Christ had come and made payment of it: and unbelievers among the Jews were under condemnation, by the testimony even of the ceremonial law; as well as for the additional sins which the multiplying of precepts necessarily occasioned. (Note, Rom. 5:20,21.) At the same time, the Gentiles, who had not so much as these typical expiations, were under condemnation as transgressors, and were excluded by them even from the visible church. (Note, Eph. 2:11—13.) But Christ not only “blotted out” the debt, but removed the bond out of the way, and “nailed it” as a cancelled deed “to his cross,” that it might no more appear against his people. The ceremonial law, therefore, and the whole Mosaic dispensation, having received their intended accomplishment in Christ, were of no more force or value, than a cancelled bond: and the Gentiles, being admitted into the church by faith in Christ, and which they had openly professed by baptism, had no need of circumcision, or of any legal observances, and ought not to pay any regard to them. (Marg. Ref. z—b.)—Moreover, Christ had at the same time virtually deprived the “principalities and powers” of darkness of their usurped dominion; and made way for the subversion of their kingdom, which was before universally established throughout the Gentile world. For, by satisfying the justice of God for sin, he had removed the cause of fallen man’s subjection to Satan; and made way for the preaching of the gospel to the nations, “with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven,” to make it successful. So that he vanquished those enemies, when he hung upon the cross, ‘triumphing over them by it, even by that cross, whereby they hoped to have triumphed over him.’ Doddridge. When he arose and ascended, he led them captive; and he made an open show of his victory, and manifested the triumphs of his cross, when, by the preaching of his gospel he proceeded to destroy Satan’s strong-holds, and to rescue his captives in the different nations of the earth. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. John 12:27—33. 2 Cor. 10:1—6. Eph. 4:7—13.)—Against us. (14) ‘Circumcision publicly testified innate depravity: the purifications, the pollutions of sin, and the sacrifices, that its guilt deserved death, to which the remarkable saying of Augustine refers; In those ceremonies there was rather the confession, than the removal of sin.’ Beza.—The silencing of the heathen oracles and the gradual, yet rapid subversion of the Grecian and Roman idolatry, in consequence of the death of Christ, are fixed on by some commentators, as almost the exclusive meaning of the clause, “triumphing over them on it;” but these, however important, constituted only a small part of that victory over “the powers of darkness,” which Christ obtained on the cross, and of his subsequent triumphs. Of these triumphs the salvation of the dying thief may be considered as an earnest. (Note, Luke 23:39—43.)

(Notes, Rom. 14:1--6.) Doubtless, this last related principally to the weekly sabbath, which, as observed on the seventh day, was now become a part of the abrogated Jewish law. For the sabbath, under the Mosaic dispensation, was a ceremonial and a judicial, as well as a moral requirement: the morality of it had no necessary connexion with the seventh day in preference to all others, save as that was appointed during that dispensation: but the appropriation of a part of our time for the worship and service of God is of moral and essentially immutable obligation. (Marg. Ref. f--k.---Note, Ex. 20:8--10.) "The first day of the week," "the Lord's day," was the time kept holy by Christians, in remembrance of Christ's resurrection; and "the sabbath," in the New Testament, always signifies the seventh day, the observance of which the Judaizing teachers wanted to impose upon the Gentile converts: and "the Lord's day," not the "sabbath," is the scriptural term for this day of sacred rest. Note.---As Christ was "the Head of all principalities and powers" (10), the apostle warned the Colossians, not to allow any man to rob them of that glorious prize for which they were candidates, by giving them wrong directions, or turning them out of their course. The original word seems to be taken from the office of those, who presided in the Olympic and Isthmian games, and decided to whom the prize belonged. Now, if any man usurped authority of this kind among Christians, he would mislead all who willingly submitted to him; as well as domineer over their consciences. This was attempted by certain persons, who were "voluntary in humility," and induced, by an uncommanded and self-imposed degradation of themselves, to "worship angels;" avowing that it was improper for mean sinful creatures to come to God immediately with their prayers, and that it was therefore expedient to solicit the mediatory good offices of holy angels: and they aimed to persuade others to this practice. Thus, they ascribed divine honors to created beings; as if ever present with men in all places, and at all times, and acquainted with the sincerity and the desires of their hearts: nay, they seemed to intimate, that they were more compassionate and kind than the Lord himself! (Note, Ex. 20:3.) This might be called "humility," and indeed it was an abusement, to which a rational creature ought not to submit: yet, in fact, it originated in pride, and a most presumptuous intrusion into the supposed state of the invisible world: it substituted man's arrogant conjectures and speculations, in the place of divine revelation; and it was the genuine offspring of that self-wisdom, with which the carnal mind is so prone to be "puffed up." (Marg. Ref. n--q.) By thus exalting angels to the office of mediators, and worshipping them in that capacity; they especially dishonored Christ, the "One Mediator between God and man," to whom as "God manifested in the flesh," such worship ought to be appropriated. They did not adhere to Christ, "the Head," and sole Mediator between God and man, or maintain communion with him; but, in fact, they departed from the grand principles of the gospel, by choosing and worshipping other mediators: (Note, 1 Tim. 2:5--7.) and as no sinner can approach God, or be accepted, but in and by Christ; so this error tended directly to ruin their souls. For all true believers are united to him, and receive all grace from him: they are compacted together into one body by their union with him and with each other, and by thus filling up their proper places, and performing their proper functions, in his church; as the human body is made up of many members, compacted together, by joints, tendons, veins, and other constituent parts, united to one head. (Note, 1 Cor. 12:12--26.) Thus Christians derive spiritual nourishment from Christ, through his ordinances; and, being knit together, they increase in knowledge and holiness, by the power of God, and grow up into nearer conformity to him. (Marg. Ref. s.—z.—Note, Eph. 4:14—16.)—It has before been intimated, that the Jews seem to have borrowed some of the Pagan notions, and applied them to the scriptural doctrine of angels: by these means, the Judaizing teachers had begun to corrupt Christianity with a new and refined species of idolatry. To what lengths the same principles afterwards carried professed Christians, in the worship of departed saints, real or imaginary, and the worship of images, as well as that of angels, especially in the church of Rome, is well known: and indeed it continues, in very many places, unimpaired to this day. But the whole has always been done in direct defiance to the apostle's testimony, which fully proves, all such practices to be as contrary to the honor of Christ in the gospel, as the most gross, or rather acknowledged idolatry is to the honor of God in the law.—Many expositors bestow great pains, in showing what heretics, or heretical teachers, the apostle had in view; and what sects of the philosophers had supplied, so to speak, the materials for these corruptions of the gospel. But it appears to me, that if Cerinthus, or the Gnostics, or any other heretics, had been then known, as avowing anti-christian tenets; the apostle would no more have scrupled to name them, than he did to name "Hymeneus and Philetus:" unless he had thought that by naming some, he should be supposed to exculpate others, who, with some shades of difference, were equally corrupting the gospel. In like manner, the Stoics and Epicureans are named by the sacred historian, in the same way, as the Pharisees and Sadducees are; (Note, Acts 17:18.) and if Christianity had been corrupted, exclusively, by the speculations of Pythagoreans or Platonists, it does not appear, why the apostle should omit to protest against them. But, if all the sects of the philosophers held notions suited to corrupt Christianity, then the reason is evident, why the apostle names no one: and it is equally strong against our interpreting his words of any one exclusively. In fact, it is of immensely more importance for us to know what, than whom, he opposed: for if our attention be engrossed by the danger of ancient Christians, from this or the other sect, either of heretics or philosophers: we shall probably be led to forget our own danger, from papists, Socinians, philosophizing infidels, rational Christians, (as some falsely call themselves,) and all the varieties of superstitious and enthusiastical deceivers; against all of whom the apostle's words, as explained in an enlarged sense, most solemnly warn us.

Note.—If the Colossians were indeed become "dead with Christ" to the ceremonial law, Christ having discharged and cancelled that bond, as well as to their pagan superstitions and vices; why did they act as if they were still "living in the world," under a carnal dispensation, and strangers to a more spiritual worship and service? and why did any of them submit to those, who dogmatically imposed legal observances, and human traditions of any kind on them? (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, 8,9.—Note, Gal. 4:1—3,8—11. Eph. 2:14—18.) The Judaizing teachers, having imbibed also the notions of the heathen philosophers, had crept into the church at Colossæ, and with great eagerness inculcated their principles; and seem to have met with countenance from some persons there. These dogmatists called on them, in a dogmatical and authoritative manner, not "to touch," or to eat such food, as was legally unclean, and not so much as to "taste" it; nor yet to handle any thing, which might pollute them: probably requiring them also to refrain from marriage. (Marg. Ref. e.—1 Cor. 7:1.)—The next words are differently interpreted. But the more general, and, as it appears to me, the best founded interpretation, supposes the apostle to refer to our Lord's words concerning the traditions of the Pharisees; and implies, that abstaining from such things, when not divinely prohibited, as supported the body by perishing themselves, could do nothing towards the salvation of the soul: as, all such things perish with the using, and could communicate no real defilement. 20. 1 Cor. 6:12—17.)—Typical instructions had, in former ages, been conveyed by the ritual law; but its obligation had now ceased, and it was of no more authority, than “the tradition of the elders,” and other doctrines and commandments of human invention, which the false teachers added to it.—“The worship of angels,” and the distinction of meats, had “a show of wisdom,” which might impose on the injudicious and superficial. To add voluntarily to the rule of duty, and thus to render it more strict, had a semblance of great devotion and extraordinary sanctity: but it implied that God had given a defective rule; and that he would be pleased with what he had never commanded. (Notes, Deut. 4:2. Prov. 30:5,6. Rev. 22:18—21, vv. 18,19.) It might also appear very “humble” to worship angels: yet this arose from abominable pride and unbelief. (Note, 18, 19.) The abstaining from meats, with various self-imposed austerities, might have a show of extraordinary spirituality, by which the body was neglected, from an affected superiority to animal indulgence, and willingness for mortification and suffering: yet all this was not “in any honor” to God, or any thing valuable in itself: nay, the whole tended to “satisfy,” in a dishonorable manner, the propensities of the flesh, or “the carnal mind,” by gratifying self-will, self-wisdom, self-righteousness, bigotry, and contempt of others. (Marg. Ref. h, i.)—The last clause is differently interpreted.—“Nor are they of any value, as they regard those things, by which the flesh is gratified (or pampered.)” Beza. By “the flesh,” he means “the carnal mind,” which is gratified with every thing that affords nutriment to pride, self-preference, and contempt of others.—“Not by any provision for satisfying the flesh:” τιμή (honor) ‘sometimes in scripture signifies the food and clothing necessary for the body. ... Thus the provision of the necessaries and conveniences of life, made for parents, elders, and widows, is called τιμή. (1 Tim. 5:17.) The body is as real a part of our nature as the soul, and ought to have such food and recreation, as are necessary to its health and vigor. ... The wisdom which teaches the “neglecting of the body,” is not wisdom, but folly.’ Macknight.—“Forbidding marriage, which “is honorable in all.”—And allowing no honorable means of satisfying those desires, which are implanted by nature, ... brought them to all dishonorable lusts.’ Hammond. If this last meaning could be clearly made out, and established, it would very well suit the context. For it can hardly be doubted, that the Holy Spirit led the apostle to speak against the corruptions, by which certain Judaizing and speculating teachers, grafting the heathen philosopher, so to speak, on the superstitious Pharisee, attempted to corrupt the church, in language strictly prophetic of the subsequent corruptions of the “man of sin,” the papal antichrist. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.)—But it can hardly be supposed, that the words translated “satisfying the flesh,” which seems to imply full gratification, even to repletion, would have been used by the apostle in this connexion: so that, on the whole, the first interpretation appears to me the most satisfactory. While it puffed up men with a vain conceit of their own sanctity; it might rather be said to tend to the dishonorable satisfying “of the flesh,” while it seemed most to afflict it: for that self-complacency, ostentation, and contempt of others, with which these severities are often attended, is indeed a carnal principle: nor could the grossest sensualities be more contrary to the will of God, and the genius of true religion.’ Doddridge.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

They, who in some good measure know the worth of immortal souls, will seek and pray for the salvation of sinners all over the earth: and such as greatly love their brethren, will earnestly strive for the establishment and progress even of those whom they have not seen; and, when they can do nothing else, they may “wrestle with God” in prayer for them.—The hearts of Christians are commonly comforted and animated, in proportion as they are “knit together in love:” and there are riches in “the full assurance of understanding” of the gospel, with which believers in general are but little acquainted. Indeed, there is an inexhaustible mine of most precious treasure in the word of God; from which men are enriched, in proportion to the simplicity, humble teachableness, diligence and perseverance, with which they seek it. (Notes, 3:16,17. Prov. 2:1—9. Matt. 13:44.)—We cannot comprehend “the mystery of God, even of the Father and of Christ;” but we may believe, acknowledge, contemplate, and adore. Thus we shall derive, from the treasures laid up in our Emmanuel, supplies of wisdom and knowledge, far more valuable than all man’s boasted science and philosophy: but these treasures are “hidden” from the proud and unbelieving, and can be discovered and appropriated only by faith. We have peculiar need to insist on these things in the present day, when so many are employed in “beguiling men with enticing words;" extolling the powers of human reason, and depreciating revelation; deriding theology, and idolizing philosophy; boasting of demonstration and experiment in natural science; rejecting unanswerable evidences of the divine inspiration of the scriptures; and treating all experience of the power of divine grace in the heart with the most sovereign contempt. While multitudes of frivolous and superficial speculators are thus "beguiled" into infidelity, skepticism, or destructive perversions of Christianity; it must rejoice every established believer and every zealous minister, to know that there is yet a remnant to be found, and an increasing remnant, dispersed through the land, and divers nations, who "walk orderly," according to the obedience and worship of the gospel, and "are steadfast in the faith" of Christ: with these he will find his heart united; and, if he have opportunity, he will exhort them to "walk in Christ," even as they have received him, to be their Prophet, Priest, and King; that, being "rooted in him, and built upon him," they may be steadfast in the faith, and fruitful in every good work, "abounding therein with thanksgiving," and holy joy and exultation.

V. 8—17.

Let young persons, and inquirers after the truth, especially beware, "lest any man spoil them through philosophy." They may depend upon it, that all the boasted knowledge, which is opposed to the mysteries of the Person and redemption of Christ, is "a vain deceit," a "worldly wisdom;" like that of Jewish Scribes who crucified Christ, or that of heathen philosophers who counted the preaching of the cross to be foolishness. Men cannot follow such vain delusions, and be the disciples of Christ: for "in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." All true Christians glory in this "great mystery of godliness;" and all who oppose it are strangers to the life of faith, and the way to the Father. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. John 14:4-6, v. 6.)—Without union and communion with Christ, and with the Father through him, by "the supply of his Spirit," we can do nothing: (Note, John 15:3-5.) but true Christians are "complete in him." They derive all things which they want from his fulness; and they are safe in his keeping, who is the Head of "all principality and power."—If we enter into the spirit of genuine Christianity, we have no occasion either for Jewish ceremonies, or newly-invented superstitions. "The circumcision of the heart," the "crucifixion of the flesh," the death and burial to sin and the world, and the resurrection to newness of life, implied in baptism, and connected with "faith of the operation of God," sufficiently prove that our sins are forgiven, our debt is blotted out and cancelled, and that we are fully delivered from the curse of the law. He, who "triumphed upon the cross" over the principalities and powers of darkness, will also, from his glorious throne, defend us from all their assaults and stratagems, till he has made us "more than conquerors." (Notes, Rom. 8:32-39. 16:17-20.) We want no other wisdom, righteousness, strength, holiness, liberty, or victory, than those which Christ bestows. We need not regard those, who "judge us in respect of meats and drinks, and holy-days," or other human traditions, which are not so much as "a shadow of things to come," as Jewish ceremonies once were: but we enjoy the substance in Christ, living by faith in him, and walking in his ordinances and commandments blameless.

V. 18—23.

Having one all-sufficient "Advocate with the Father," we want no other mediators; and must not by any means abase ourselves to worship fellow-servants, to the great dishonor of our common Lord. (Notes, Rev. 19:9, 10. 22:8, 9.) Such voluntary self-degradation is real pride, which refuses submission to the teaching, righteousness, and authority of God: and it is the genuine effect of "a carnal mind, puffed up" with imagined knowledge, and "vainly intruding into those things which are not seen." The church has long enough been corrupted, and souls deceived, with these gross delusions, with human inventions, "will-worship," and self-imposed austerities: men have long enough been misled by those who said, "Touch not, taste not, handle not;" concerning such "things as perish with the using." But, whatever show there may be of wisdom, sanctity, or mortification in these devices, they certainly are worthless in themselves, they neither honor nor please God: and they gratify the proud self-preference, the domineering bigotry, and the persecuting temper of the carnal heart of man. Let us then not depart from the simplicity of our dependence on the Lord Jesus, and obedience to him. He is our Head of authority and influence, "from whom the whole body, by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God." As "dead with him" to the world, and its wisdom and maxims, let us willingly bear his yoke, and steadily assert our liberty from human impositions. What he has left indifferent, let us regard as such, and leave others to the like freedom; and, remembering the transient nature of earthly things, let us endeavor to glorify God by a temperate, thankful, and charitable use of them.

CHAP. III.

The apostle exhorts Christians to "seek" and "set their affections on things above;" as risen with Christ, and as following him to heaven, 1-4; to mortify all carnal lusts, to put away malice, and to seek conformity to Christ in holiness, 5-11; especially in love of each other, readiness to forgive injuries, and gratitude to God, 12-15; to "let the word of Christ dwell in them richly;" to abound in grateful praises; and to "do all things in the name of Christ," 16, 17. He gives exhortations to wives and husbands, 18, 19; to children and parents, 20, 21; and to servants, 22-25.

4 When Christ, who is <sup>i</sup>our Life, shall <sup>k</sup>appear, then shall <sup>l</sup>ye also appear with him in glory.

Note.—If the Christians at Colossè were indeed “risen with Christ,” as their baptism and profession, and former consistent conduct implied, it behoved them to show it more and more, and to press forward in the divine life, by “seeking those things which are above.” (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 2:11—15. Rom. 6: 1—11. Eph. 1:15—23. 2:4—10. 1 Pet. 4:1—6.) Perfect knowledge, holiness, and felicity, in the immediate presence of God, and in his service and love, are evidently intended by “the things which are above.” The assured hope and the happy earnest and first-fruits of these, they ought to seek; with the most decided preference to all worldly interests or pleasures, and in the diligent use of all appointed means. Thus they should follow Christ their Fore-runner: that, as they were become “dead to sin and alive to God,” in conformity to his death and resurrection, so they might be conformed to him in his ascension into heaven: where, as their Surety, he was exalted on the mediatorial throne, at the right hand of the Father, to appear in his presence and prepare a place for them. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Rom. 8:35—39. Heb. 9:24—26.) By faith beholding his glory, and aspiring in hope to this heavenly inheritance, they ought to value, choose, savor, pursue, and delight in spiritual and heavenly things, and not in earthly things. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Matt. 6:19—21. Rom. 8:5—9. 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) For, according to their profession, and the apostle’s confidence respecting them, they were already “dead” to their former hopes, interests, motives, and pursuits; all the main springs of human activity seemed broken, “and their life was hid with Christ.” The spring of that eternal life which abode in them, and from which all their present comforts, hopes, and activity were derived, was in Christ and his fulness: the streams of this living water flowed into their souls, by the influences of the Holy Spirit, through faith: thus they were united to Christ, and had communion with him; and wisdom, strength, grace, and comfort, were derived from him: he lived and ruled in them; and they lived in him, by him, and to him, (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Note, Gal. 2:17—21, v. 20.) The Fountain of their life, and the nature, supports, and principles of it, were “hidden” from carnal men; who could not understand what were the secret springs of their active diligence and joyful patience, in opposition to all temporal interests and satisfactions. (Note, Rev. 2:17.) This life was likewise secured, as “a hidden treasure,” from wicked men and fallen spirits, who could by no means deprive them of it: nor was it in their own keeping, but in that of Christ; by whom it was sustained, and who was himself the unfailling Source of it. Thus it was “with Christ, in God,” through the union of the Deity with his human nature; and so the immutable power, faithfulness, wisdom, and love of God secured it for them. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, John 10:26—31. 14:18—20. Rom. 5:7—10, 15—19. 8:10, 11, 32—34. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) When therefore, “Christ their Life should appear,” to raise the dead and judge the world; then would every one of them, who thus lived by him, “appear with him in glory,” being made completely like him, both in body and soul, that they might all be glorified together with him: and their comforts on earth, and the previous felicity of their departed spirits, would be an anticipation of this perfect and eternal glory reserved for them. 5 <sup>m</sup>Mortify therefore your <sup>n</sup>members which are upon the earth; <sup>o</sup>fornication, uncleanness, <sup>p</sup>inordinate affection, <sup>q</sup>evil concupiscence, and <sup>r</sup>covetousness, which is idolatry:

Note.—The exhortations here given are similar to those which have been already considered. (Notes, Eph. 4:17—32. 5:1—7.) The “members which are upon the earth,” signify the various lusts of man’s carnal nature, the members of “the old man,” “the body of sin.” (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Note, Rom. 7:22—25.) In the regenerate “the flesh is crucified with its affections and lusts;” yet there is still life in it. (Note, Gal. 5:22—26, v. 24.) It must therefore be daily “mortified;” a continual opposition must be made to all its corrupt workings; the supplies of its life must be as it were cut off: no provision must be made for its indulgence; temptations and occasions of sin must be avoided; and even lawful inclinations must be habituated to brook denial and delay. Thus the members of the carnal nature, which affects earthly things and disrelishes heavenly, must be continually enfeebled, and put to death by a lingering, unrelenting execution.—In the detail of particulars here adduced, we may observe, that “inordinate affection,” may relate to inexpedient and excessive desires, after even lawful indulgences of any kind: though some understand it of unnatural crimes. "Evil concupiscence," signifies the sensuality of the heart and imagination, which must be mortified, or gross crimes will follow. But several expositors explain the word rendered "covetousness," as denoting rather the excessive desire of sensual gratification, than the love of riches. (Notes, Eph. 5:3-7.) This appears to me a most dangerous misconstruction; for by this means, sensuality is supposed to be forbidden with a needless redundancy of words, and "covetousness" escapes without the least rebuke: whereas, "the love of money is the root of all" kinds of "evil," and both the scripture and matter of fact, show it to be one of the greatest possible hindrances to men's salvation, and the greatest of all snares to the professors of the gospel; nor can any vice so properly be called "idolatry," as avarice. (Marg. Ref. t, Gr.—Notes, Eph. 4:19. 5:3-5. 1 Tim. 6:6-10, vv. 9,10.)—"There being in us naturally "the old man," (9. Eph. 4:22.) and "the body of sin;" the inordinate affections and lustings of it are styled the members of that 'body; partly because they exert themselves 'by the members of the natural body; and 'partly because as the members of the body are 'employed to accomplish the desires of the natural body, so these affections are employed to 'gratify the desires of the body of sin. ... As 'heathens place their confidence in idols, so the 'avaricious man doth place his confidence in 'gold and silver. .... The covetous person, 'though he doth not indeed believe his riches 'or his money to be a god; yet by so loving 'and trusting in them, as God alone ought to 'be loved and trusted in, he is as truly guilty 'of idolatry, as if he so believed.' Whitby.—By "the children of disobedience," some understand wicked men in general; and others seem to confine the interpretation to idolaters. But the word rendered "disobedience" often signifies "unbelief." (Note, Rom. 11:25-32.)—"It signifieth the want of the obedience of 'faith.' Leigh.—And "the children of disobedience" are doubtless all those, however distinguished, who do not believe and obey the gospel; while the most profligate and abandoned, believing and obeying the gospel, become the "children of obedience." (Notes, Eph. 2:1,2. 5:5-7. 1 Pet. 1:13-16.)—The rites of Bacchus and Cybele were peculiarly observed at Colossè, the chief city of Phrygia, and conducted exceedingly to deprave the morals of the inhabitants, in many of the things here spoken of: but alas! the case of immense multitudes, even in professed Christian countries, requires precisely the same warnings and exhortations.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Christians at Colossè had once habitually practised one or other of the above-mentioned vices, when they lived "among" those who were of the same character, and when they had no experience or expectation of nobler interests or satisfactions. (Marg. Ref. u.) But now, they must not only mortify these gross sensual propensities, which had acquired strength by habit; but they must "put off," or lay aside as a cast-off garment, all evil practices, especially those which are next recapitulated. (Marg. Ref. x—b.—Notes, Rom. 13:11-14. Eph. 4:20-32. Jam. 1:19-21. 1 Pet. 2:1-3.)—The word translated "blasphemy," may signify slanders and revilings, as well as profane speeches respecting God and holy things. These, as well as all polluting discourse, and falsehood of every kind, must be renounced; seeing "they had put off the old man with his deeds," by the mortification of the carnal nature, and by ceasing from the allowed practice of all sin. They ought therefore to avoid whatever was, in the least degree, inconsistent with their profession. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Rom. 6:1-11.) And as they "had put on the new man," and professed their conformity to Christ; and as this renewal of the soul after the holy image of him who had at first created it, (Note, Gen. 1:26,27.) and who had thus new-created it, was, "in knowledge," or by the transforming "knowledge of the glory of God in Christ;" (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:17,18. 4:3-6.) so they ought to act like men who were of one mind and judgment with the Lord, "hating iniquity and loving righteousness" in their whole conduct: or, "unto knowledge," that knowledge of God and his holy truth and will, which, rectifying the judgment, produces, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, a revolution in the will and affections, and so induces men "to walk in newness of life." All wickedness springs from ignorance and delusion in spiritual things; and "without knowledge the heart cannot be good." (Marg. Ref. d—h.) The Colossians were indeed fully admitted to all the privileges of God's people, and ought therefore to act in character. They were now members of the Christian church, in which all other distinctions were abolished. Greeks and Jews, circumcised and uncircumcised, illiterate persons of the most barbarous nations, the uncivilized Scythians, and the meanest slaves as well as free men, were all equally made the children and heirs of God, by faith in Christ: their relation to him alone was requisite, and sufficient for their admission to all these privileges; (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:17—24. Gal. 3:26—29.) and he dwelt in them all, by the power of his Spirit transforming them into his own holy image, by which they were distinguished from all other persons. Christ was "all things" to them; (Note, 2:10.) and Christ was "in them all." (*Marg. Ref. i—o.—Notes, 1:25—27. John 6:52—58. 14:18—24. 15:1—8. 17:22,23. Rom. 8:10,11. Note.—(Notes, Eph. 1:3—8. 2 Thes. 2:13, 14. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.) "As the elect of God," who had been beloved and chosen in Christ, and "called to be saints," or holy persons, the Christians at Colossæ were required to "put on," and manifest in their whole conduct, a tender, compassionate, kind, lowly, unambitious, meek, and patient spirit; "bearing with each other, and forgiving one another," if any dispute, or cause of complaint, arose among them, after the example of Christ's love to them. (Marg. Ref. q—z.—Notes, Eph. 4:1—6,30—32. 5:1,2. Phil. 2:1—4.) Over all these, let them "put on charity," or active liberal love, benevolence, and good-will to all mankind. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, 1 Cor. 13:4—7. 2 Pet. 1:5—7.) This would be as the bond of union to all their other graces, and form their characters consistent. It would compact them into one body, and produce the most perfect state of the church on earth: as indeed it is the very "bond," which unites God and all holy beings, in the perfect happiness and holiness of heaven. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, 1 Cor. 13:8—13. 1 Thes. 4:9—11.) And as "the peace of God," in their hearts and consciences, was the source of all their comforts; that peace ought to "rule within them," as the umpire of all their differences; that they might be influenced by so endearing an example, to "live peaceably with all men." Especially this should teach them "to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace:" because they had been called into a state of peace with God, "in one body," as united in Christ their Head; for which it behoved them to be exceedingly thankful, and to show their gratitude in this manner, and in every other way by which they possibly could do it. or deed, do all <sup>r</sup> in the name of the Lord Jesus, <sup>s</sup> giving thanks to <sup>t</sup> God and the Father by him.

Note.—By “the word of Christ” the whole of the sacred scripture seems to be meant; which was all from him, as “the Light of the world,” and the personal “Word of God;” and which, in one way or other, all related to him. (Note, Rev. 19:9,10.)—It was very important, that the Colossians should, by diligent study and meditation, store their memories, and understandings with the instructions of scripture that it might thus abundantly dwell within them; (Note, 2 John 1—3.) and that so their judgments might be formed upon it, their hearts cast into the mould of it, and their consciences directed by it. Thus they would be enriched in all “spiritual wisdom and knowledge,” (Note, 2:1—4.) and would learn to act wisely in their whole conduct; or, they would be influenced to use their knowledge in all wisdom, by reducing it to practice. (Marg. Ref. f—i.) This would enable them, with readiness and pertinency, to teach, caution, exhort, reprove, or encourage “one another:” while those psalms and sacred poems, which they sang together with holy affections, under the influence of divine “grace in their hearts,” to the glory of the Lord, would furnish them with words suited to such mutual admonitions. (Marg. Ref. k—o.) Their idolatrous neighbors had laid up in their memories many songs, in praise of their abominable idols and imaginary deities, with their fabled exploits; and this had formerly been the case with those who now were Christians, which they used on every festive occasion, and when they met together for social intercourse; nay, for amusement and recreation when alone. In fact, it has always been the case, in every country; and the popular songs have an immense, but generally a most pernicious, effect on the people. They are learned in early life, and not soon forgotten; and often are considered as proverbial or oracular.—Let then Christians, excluding those polluting vanities, labor to get their memories and minds richly replenished with hymns and songs of praise to God; and poems of every kind, which are suited to prepare them for the worship of heaven, and to anticipate its joys; and let them use these hymns and songs constantly, not on public occasions alone, but in social meetings also; and even, when alone in their houses, or when journeying, and indeed in any other situation. (Note, Eph. 5:15—20, v. 18.) This will also render them edifying and animating companions to their fellow-Christians.—In general, whatever they are employed about, whether in conversation, in public acts of adoration, in social worship, in their secular or domestic concerns, in every thing relative to the place of their abode, their removal to other residences, their employment in life; the connexions which they form, for themselves or their children; as well as in every work of piety or charity; let them “do all in the name of the Lord Jesus;” in a believing dependence on his merits and grace, out of love to him, in obedience to his precepts, and for the honor of his name, “giving thanks to God, even the Father, by him.” For even the best services can be accepted from sinners, only through his intercession: and nothing ought to be ventured on or engaged in by them or any Christians, which cannot thus be done “in the name” and for the sake of Jesus the Saviour. This would render the meanest employment "a service acceptable, well-pleasing unto God:" and, however such servants might fail of pleasing their masters, they would certainly receive an abundant, though gracious reward from God, especially in the heavenly inheritance. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The sincerity of our professed faith and love must be evidenced by a consistent temper and conduct: and we should prove that we are spiritually alive, as risen with our risen Saviour, by earnestly seeking and delighting in those "things which are above, where Jesus sitteth at the right hand of God," in most decided preference to all earthly things, and with a holy indifference about them. Thus we shall know our interest in his atonement, by the life which we have derived from him; (Note, Rom. 8:5—9.) and may be assured, that "when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." This life of faith, however, and experienced communion with an unseen Saviour, must be hid from ungodly men, and frequently derided by them. Having such hopes and comforts, we should daily employ ourselves in mortifying every carnal affection, and in seeking a more entire deliverance, not only from all hankering after forbidden gratifications, but from "inordinate affection," and every desire of sensual indulgence even if lawful, if in any way inexpedient; and from that idolatrous "covetousness, which God abhorreth:" for "because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." In such practices and pursuits we might have been left to perish: for, whether we once "walked in them," or not, we were by nature prone to them, and should have lived and died among "the children of disobedience," if we had been left to ourselves. (Notes, Eph. 2:3. Tit. 3:4—7.) Let us then also put off anger, malice, slander, revilings, irreverent words concerning God, polluting discourse, and all kinds and degrees of insincerity: for a Christian should no more dishonor God and disgrace himself by any of these, than a courtier should dishonor his prince, and demean himself, by wearing squalid and ragged garments. Having therefore "put off the old man and his deeds," and "put on Christ," and being "renewed in knowledge after his image;" let us study more and more to copy his example, to have the same mind which was in him, and to act consistently with our rank and character.

V. 12—25.

We may well be indifferent to all other interests and distinctions, if we be indeed true believers, seeing "Christ is all and in all:" but we should be earnestly desirous of evidencing that we are "the elect of God, holy and beloved," by cultivating every benign, friendly, humble, and gentle temper; by copying the forgiveness through which we are saved; and by putting on that "love which is the bond of perfectness," that it may above all appear in every part of our conduct; while "we follow peace with all men," and are of one mind with those who belong to the Lord's body.—We should also seek to be enriched in divine "knowledge and wisdom," by a comprehensive acquaintance with "the word of Christ;" that, being familiarly versed in the Holy Scriptures, we may be "thoroughly furnished unto every good work." From this sacred treasury, we may deduce instructions for mutual admonition, while we unite in the worship of God, and in praising him "with grace in our hearts;" and so we shall be habitually led to "do all things in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God, even the Father, by him." By these means, our ordinary employments and relative conduct will be sanctified, and made a spiritual sacrifice. Thus the disobedient and disobliging behavior of wives, and the bitter words and harsh conduct of husbands, will alike be precluded; because such things are not meet for those who are devoted to the Lord. Children will thus learn obedience to their parents, because "this is well-pleasing to the Lord;" and, from the same motives, parents will learn to exercise their authority with prudence and gentleness; not exasperating their children by violent anger or durable resentment, nor discouraging them by disapproving of their endeavors to please. Thus, servants will learn to be faithful, diligent, and conscientious in obeying their masters, from fear of God, and regard to his authority and all-seeing eye upon them. In short, true religion will teach every man to do the work of his station "heartily," from his soul, to the best of his ability, and with cheerful diligence, "as unto the Lord and not unto men," in obedient faith, as the servant of Christ, expecting from him the gracious reward of the heavenly inheritance; and fearing, when tempted to do wrong, lest he should come short of that inheritance, or expose himself to the displeasure of God, who is "no Respector of persons." These principles, and these alone, will render men universally conscientious, in all places and circumstances, from love to Christ, zeal for his glory, a desire of recommending the gospel, and of possessing the assurance that they are interested in its blessings. But that evangelical profession, which leaves men regardless of relative duties, and gives those with whom they are connected just cause for complaint, is very much to be suspected; and the misconduct in the several relations of life, of many who are zealous for the doctrines of the gospel, is so evidently and habitually wrong, that there can be no doubt but they deceive themselves, as well as disgrace the cause. Let us then earnestly pray for grace, to enable us "to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," in these and in all other things; that the sincerity of our love may be evinced, beyond all reasonable ground of doubt, either in our own consciences, or in those of other men.

CHAP. IV.

Masters are charged to behave properly to their servants, 1: Exhortations to perseverance in prayer, 2-4; and to prudence and edifying speech, 5, 6. The apostle commends Tychicus and Onesimus, by whom he sends the epistle, 7-9; and concludes with salutations, admonitions, and directions, 10-18.

MASTERS, <sup>a</sup> give unto your servants, that which is just and equal; knowing that <sup>b</sup> ye also have a Master in heaven.

Note.—(Note, 3:22—25.) The concluding verse of the preceding chapter relates to masters, as well as to servants: and the former are here more expressly exhorted, to give their servants that support and recompense for their labors which are just and equitable; implying care of them in sickness, provision in old age, and proportionable rewards for extraordinary fidelity and exertions. Thus they should in all things act towards them in a considerate and reasonable manner; not abusing their authority, but remembering their accountableness to their Master in heaven. (*Marg. 4 That <sup>k</sup> I may make it manifest, <sup>l</sup> as I ought to speak.

Note.—In order to the suitable performance of all the before-mentioned duties, the apostle exhorted the Colossians to persist steadily in prayer; watching against all indisposition and impediments; persevering notwithstanding delays, temptations, and discouragements; and joining thanksgivings for mercies continually received, to their prayers and supplications in behalf of themselves and others. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Phil. 4:3—7. 1 Pet. 4:7.) He especially excited them to pray for him, and his brethren in the ministry; that God would give them opportunity and boldness to speak "the mystery of Christ," for which the apostle was then a prisoner; (Notes, 1:25—27. Eph. 3:1—12.) that both while thus circumstanced, and when set at liberty, he might "fulfill manifest" the counsel of God, concerning the way of salvation, and the calling of the Gentiles, as he ought to do, without fearing what man could do unto him. 6 Let<sup>p</sup> your speech be always with grace, <sup>q</sup> seasoned with salt, that ye may know <sup>r</sup> how ye ought to answer every man.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—“Wisdom toward them that were without,” might perhaps be intended to include a prudent caution, not to expose themselves needlessly to their persecutors, to which some expositors in a great measure restrict it. But the words contain a general rule of great extent and importance; implying such habitual propriety, circumspection, and discretion in the whole conduct, as may preserve Christians from being ensnared or drawn into sin by their unconverted neighbors, and from giving them any unfavorable impressions of the gospel; and such an evident excellency of character, as may silence calumny, soften prejudice, and win upon the beholders, to examine into those religious principles which produce such happy effects. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Note, Matt. 10:16—18, v. 18.) Thus the Colossians ought to “redeem their time,” in acquiring and exercising this heavenly wisdom, to the honor of God and the good of mankind: (Notes, Jam. 3:13—18.) in order that their conversation might not only be inoffensive, but “always with grace,” the genuine language of piety, purity, wisdom, and love; savoring of heavenly things, as meat is preserved, and made relishing, by being seasoned with salt. (Note, Jam. 3:1—6.) By attention to these rules, they would “know how they ought to answer every man:” whether he asked a reason of their hope, and seriously inquired into the nature of Christianity; or desired a solution of some doubt or difficulty; or whether he were disposed to object, cavil, dispute or revile: for the meekness of heavenly wisdom would dictate a pertinent answer on every occasion, and preserve them from disgraceful contentions. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Notes, Prov. 26:4—6. Matt. 22:15—40. Eph. 4:17—19. 5:15—20, vv. 15—17. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.)—Salt. (6) The wit, smartness, or ingenuity, often accompanied with polluting or profane allusions, which was customary and admired among the Greeks, was called Allie Salt. Probably, the apostle refers to this, but shows his readers a far more excellent way. (Notes, Lev. 2:13. 2 Kings 2:19—22. Matt. 5:13. Mark 9:43—50, vv. 49,50.)

The word διακονος is used with great latitude, and the apostle uses it of himself; (1:23,25. 1 Cor. 9:5.) nay, of Christ his Lord. (Rom. 15:8.) concerning him, shows how high he now stood in the apostle's estimation: and it also implies, that Tychicus was not "one of them;" that is, one of Colossè. (12)—Aristarchus continued with Paul during his imprisonment; but it is not certain whether this was voluntary, or whether he was confined with him for the sake of the gospel: the latter however is probable. (Notes, Acts 19:23—31. 20:1—6. 27:1,2.) Marcus, or John Mark, nephew to Barnabas, was before this fully reconciled to the apostle; and Paul's unfavorable opinion of him was completely erased, by his subsequent good conduct. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, Acts 13:13—15. 15:36—41. 2 Tim. 4:9—13.) Probably, the Colossians had formerly received some injunction from the apostle, not to countenance Mark as a minister; but he now reversed it: for he and Aristarchus, with one called Jesus, (a common name among the Jews,) and surnamed "Justus" because of his integrity, were the only ministers "of the circumcision," who had cordially united with him in preaching the kingdom of God among the Gentiles; and who had been a comfort to him, by their animating converse, hearty counsel, and zealous concurrence or assistance, in all his designs. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, Prov. 27:9.) This is generally and justly urged, as absolutely conclusive against the traditions of the papists, that the apostle Peter was at this time bishop of Rome, where he resided twenty-five years! It also renders it highly probable, that Luke was not a Jew, or a circumcised proselyte. (Preface to the Gospel according to St. Luke.)—Ephaphras, a Colossian, a pastor of the church, and probably its founder, sent his salutations to them. (Note, 1:3—8.) He could not then attend his labors among them, being confined as a prisoner; (Note, Philem. 22—25.) but he continually prayed for them so fervently, that he even "labored," agonized, or wrestled, with God for them; that they might be established in the faith, be steadfast and upright disciples of Christ, and complete in the knowledge and practice of the whole will of God. (Note, 2:1—4.) For the apostle could testify to the greatness of his zeal, for the spiritual welfare of the Colossians, and of those other neighboring churches, with which he had been connected.—Luke had long been Paul's beloved companion, in travel and in sufferings; he had been educated a physician, but he seems to have been an "evangelist," or preacher of the gospel in the various cities to which he went. With him Demas sent his salutations, of whom we afterwards read an unfavorable account. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Note, 2 Tim. 4:9—13.)

16 And when <sup>t</sup> this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea.

Note.—Nymphas seems to have been an eminent Christian at Laodicea, whose well ordered family might properly be called a Christian church, or a society by whom the Lord was stately worshipped. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Matt. 18:15—18.) The apostle directed this epistle to be read in the neighboring church of Laodicea, as it was suited for general instruction; and that an epistle, which they would receive from Laodicea, should be publicly read among them. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:23—28, v. 27.) This direction has given rise to various conjectures: but probably the apostle had written to the Laodiceans, though the epistle was not preserved.—For all the epistles, which the 'apostles ever wrote, are not preserved; any 'more than all the words and actions of our 'blessed Lord.' Doddridge.—Some think, that the epistle to the Ephesians was intended to be a kind of circular letter; and that, by private direction, a copy of it was sent to Laodicea, to be thence forwarded to Colossè. Indeed, that epistle contains so little peculiar to the church at Ephesus, and so much important instruction of general interest, that this opinion, though probably unfounded, is not destitute of plausibility. (Preface to Ephesians.)

17 And say to <sup>u</sup> Archippus, <sup>x</sup> Take heed to <sup>y</sup> the ministry, which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou <sup>z</sup> fulfil it.

Note.—Some suppose Archippus to have been the bishop of Colossè.—That he should 'have been then bishop of Colossè, and that St. Paul should not write one word, or send one 'salutation, to him; but send to the people at 'Colossè to admonish him of his duty, is not 'very credible.' Whitby.—'Archippus being 'old and infirm, ... received this encouragement 'from the apostle, to strengthen him.' Bengelius. It is far more probable, that he had been newly appointed to the ministry; and showed some symptoms of timidity or negligence: the apostle therefore sent a message to him in particular, charging him to take heed to his sacred ministry: and to perform fully the several duties of it, with diligence, faithfulness, boldness, and zealous affection; for the edification of believers and the conversion of sinners, by sound doctrine, a holy example, fervent prayers, unwearied labors, and every means in his power. For he had "received it from the Lord," being accountable to him for his conduct in it; he was warranted to expect his assistance in his endeavors to act by his authority; and he was bound to seek his glory, in a decided preference to his own ease, security, interest, reputation, or accommodation. Note.—The apostle wrote the salutation with his own hand, as usual. (Notes, Rom. 16:21—23. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. 2 Thes. 3:17.) He called on the Colossians to “remember his bonds” and long continued sufferings for their sake as Gentile converts: this would confirm them in the faith, render them constant in enduring persecutions for the same cause, and induce them to pay the more entire regard to his admonitions: and he concluded with praying that the grace of God might be with them. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Cor. 13:14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

There “is no respect of persons” with God; and his ministers must act with similar impartiality, and instruct and exhort masters as well as servants, the rich as well as the poor, and rulers as well as their subjects, when opportunity is given them, in the duties of their several stations; and to render to their inferiors “what is just and equal, knowing that they also have a Master in heaven.” None of these duties can be performed aright, except we “persevere in prayer,” “and watch unto it with thanksgiving;” and it is “just and equal” that masters, professing godliness, should pray for and with their servants, and give them suitable instructions for their souls, as well as a comfortable provision for their temporal life.—Those who love the gospel should always remember faithful ministers in their prayers; beseeching the Lord to assist and prosper all their labors, and to enable them, with suitable plainness and boldness, to declare “the mystery of Christ.” (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:12—16. 4:1—4.) and they who are exposed to peculiar dangers or sufferings, in the cause of the gospel, should be especially remembered in the supplications of their brethren.—Great wisdom and circumspection are required in all our conduct, “towards those that are without;” with whom we are often connected in relative life, and engaged in secular concerns. They will certainly watch and scrutinize our whole behavior; and sometimes artfully endeavor to persuade, entice, or provoke us to sin, that they may charge the blame on our religious principles: and they will make little or no allowance for our faults; so that even our indiscretions may produce an abiding prejudice against the truth. On the other hand, a sober, discreet, upright, faithful, and friendly conduct will frequently win upon them, and be greatly instrumental to their good. We ought then to “redeem the time;” that we may employ it in seeking wisdom from the word and Spirit of God; as well as in using it for the benefit of mankind. We should indeed store our hearts with good treasure, and seek to have them seasoned with wisdom and grace, that our speech may always be instructive, and suited to the persons with whom we converse; and that we “may know how we ought to answer every man,” on whatever occasion we may be called to do it.

V. 7—18.

Christians should desire to know one another's state: and mutual visits, or friendly correspondence, among faithful ministers and fellow-servants of Christ, may help forward this ‘communion of saints,’ excite their prayers for each other, and conduce to the comfort of their hearts.—What amazing changes does divine grace make in men's characters! Dishonest and worthless servants thus become “faithful and beloved brethren.” Often “the first becomes last, and the last first,” in the visible church: (Notes, Matt. 19:29, 30. 20:1—16, v. 16. Luke 13:22—30, v. 30.) our fears of some who have misbehaved are removed, and they become “fellow-workers who are a comfort to us;” while our hopes of others are grievously disappointed. But “the Lord knoweth them that are his;” and we should always “labor fervently in prayer” for those connected with us, “that they may stand perfect and complete in the whole will of God;” in this manner testifying our zeal for them, when unable to render them other help.—Ministers, especially when they first enter upon their office, or when they seem wavering in it, should be seriously and affectionately exhorted, “to take heed to their ministry, which they have received of the Lord, that they fulfil it.” For the smiles, flatteries, or frowns of the world, the spirit of error, and the various workings of self-love, turn many aside, or lead them into such a style of preaching and living, as comes very far short of “fulfilling their ministry,” and “making full proof of it.” Thus their own souls are endangered; their flocks are soothed into a formal profession, or deluded into error; and the promising hopes, which had been entertained of their usefulness, are lamentably disappointed. Let such persons, then, “take heed to themselves and to their doctrine,” as those who serve the Lord Jesus; let them remember the counsel of Paul, his bonds for Christ, and his laborious, self-denying faithfulness even unto death: for in preaching his doctrine, imbibing his spirit, and copying his example, we may expect that the favor and blessing of God will be with our souls, and prosper all the labors of our hand. THE
FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

IN the notes on the concise narrative of the apostle's labors at Thessalonica, it has been shown to be at least highly probable, that he continued there a considerable time, preaching to the Gentiles, beyond the "three sabbath days," on which he "reasoned with the Jews in the synagogues;" and that he was peculiarly successful. (Notes, Acts 17:1—9.) He was, however, at length constrained, by the persecution of the zealots for the Mosaic law, and the zealots for idolatry, who had formed a most unnatural coalition against him, to leave the newly planted church under heavy trials, and destitute of many advantages: for though it seems clear, that pastors had been appointed over them; yet, the pastors themselves must have been new and inexperienced converts. (Note, 5:12—15.) The apostle was, on this account, peculiarly solicitous about them; and Timothy having come to him at Athens, according to his appointment, he chose to be left alone in that city, that he might send this his faithful coadjutor to Thessalonica. (Notes, 3:1—10. Acts 17:10—15. 18:1—6.) But Timothy, returning to him at Corinth, brought him so good an account of them, that he was filled by it with joy and gratitude. He indeed exceedingly longed to visit them: but, having been repeatedly disappointed in his plans for that purpose, he at length wrote this epistle; which breathes a peculiar spirit of paternal love and affection, and shows that he considered the Christians at Thessalonica, as at least equal in faith and holiness, to those of any church to which he wrote. It is clear from these particulars, that this epistle was written from Corinth, and not from Athens, according to the spurious postscript; but probably soon after the apostle arrived at Corinth. This is supposed by some expositors to have been as early as A. D. 51; and by others A. D. 54; but, for reasons before given, a rather later date is here assigned to it. (Note, Acts 15:1—6. Preface to 1 Cor.—Note, Gal. 2:1—5.) It is, however, generally agreed, that it was written before any other of the apostolical epistles; and some think, probably without sufficient reason, before any other part of the New-Testament.—It was evidently the leading design of the apostle, in writing to the Thessalonians, to confirm them in the faith, and to animate them to a courageous profession of the gospel, and the practice of all the duties of Christianity, notwithstanding the persecutions and trials to which they were exposed. In pursuance of his grand object, he was led to mention, with high approbation, the manner in which they had received the gospel from him; and this almost unavoidably led him to speak of his ministry and conduct among them, in a way peculiarly instructive to the ministers of the gospel, in every age and place.—[It is remarkable, with how much address he improves 'all the influence, which his zeal and fidelity in their service must naturally give him, to inculcate upon them the precepts of the gospel, and persuade them to act agreeably to their sacred character. This was the grand point he always kept in view, and to which every thing else was made subservient. Nothing appears, in any part of his writings, like a design to establish his own reputation, or to make use of his ascendancy over his Christian friends, to answer any secular purposes of his own. On the contrary, in this and in his other epistles, he discovers a most generous disinterested regard for their welfare, expressly disclaiming all authority over their consciences, and appealing to them, that he had chosen to maintain himself by the labor of his own hands, rather than prove burdensome to the churches, or give the least color of suspicion, that, under zeal for the gospel, and concern for their improvement, he was carrying on any private sinister view.—The discovery of so excellent a temper, must be allowed to carry with it a strong presumptive argument in favor of the doctrines he taught. ... And indeed, whoever reads St. Paul's epistles with attention, and enters into the spirit with which they were written, will discern such intrinsic characters of their genuineness, and the divine authority of the doctrines they contain, as will perhaps produce in him a stronger conviction, than all the external evidence with which they are attended.] Doddridge. These remarks are well grounded and important: but to suppose, with Dr. Macknight, that the apostle intended, as his main object, to prove the divine authority of Christianity, by a chain of regular arguments, in which he answered the several objections, which the heathen philosophers are supposed to have advanced against him, seems quite foreign to the nature of the epistle; and also to be grounded on a mistaken notion, that the philosophers deigned at so early a period, to enter into a regular disputation with the Christians; when, in fact, they derided them as enthusiasts, and their doctrine as "foolishness."—It is remarkable, that the apostle, in writing this first epistle, found very much to commend, which he does unreservedly, and scarcely any thing to blame; though he saw it needful to intermix cautions and warnings, with his exhortations.—The exact, though manifestly undesigned coincidence of this epistle with the history contained in the Acts of the apostles, which it tends to elucidate and confirm, is worthy of special notice.—It appears, that afterwards the apostle visited Thessalonica; (Note, Acts 20:1—6.) but nothing further is found in scripture concerning this flourishing church, except the second epistle which the apostle wrote to it.—

Thessalonica is now called Salonica, or Salonici, and is under the dominion of the Turks, and the inhabitants are generally Mohammedans.—“Our epistle concludes with a direction, that it ‘should be publicly read in the church to which it was addressed. ... The existence of this ‘clause ... is an evidence of its authenticity: because to produce a letter, purporting to have ‘been publicly read in the church at Thessalonica, when no such letter had been read or heard ‘of in that church, would be to produce an imposture destructive of itself. ... Either the epistle was publicly read in the church of Thessalonica, during St. Paul’s life-time, or it was ‘not. If it was, no publication could be more authentic, no species of notoriety more unquestionable, no method of preserving the integrity of the copy more secure. ... If it was ‘not, the clause ... would remain a standing condemnation of the forgery, and one would suppose, an invincible impediment to its success.’ Paley.—It may also be added, that the circumstance of this injunction being given, in the first epistle which the apostle wrote, implied a strong and avowed claim to the character of an inspired writer; as, in fact, it placed his writings on the same ground, with those of Moses and the ancient prophets.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the church at Thessalonica, 1; and shows how he thanked God on their behalf, and prayed for them; remembering the fruits of their faith, love, and patient hope, as evidences of their ‘election of God,” 2-4. He speaks, more particularly, concerning the happy effects of his success among them: for, ‘receiving the word in much affliction,” copying the example of their teachers, and setting good examples to others; their conversion from idols to the service of the true God, and their patient waiting for Jesus, the Deliverer ‘from the wrath to come,” speedily became known in every place, 6-10.

PAUL, and <sup>a</sup> Silvanus, and <sup>b</sup> Timothy, <sup>c</sup> unto the church of the <sup>d</sup> Thessalonians, which is <sup>e</sup> in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ: <sup>f</sup> Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Note.—Silas, or Silvanus, did not come to the apostle, when driven from Thessalonica and Berea, till after his arrival at Corinth, nor did Timothy continue with him in that city, being speedily sent back to Thessalonica; (Notes, 3:1-5. Acts 17:10-15. 18:1-6.) so that the epistle could not be written from Athens. St. Paul joined these two faithful fellow-laborers with himself in this address, to express his affection for the Christians at Thessalonica, to whom they were well known. (Marg. Ref. a-f.) After his usual salutation and introduction, (Notes, Rom. 1:5-7. Eph. 1:1,2. 2 Thes. 1:1,2.) he observed, that he constantly remembered, and mentioned before God in his prayers, their “work of faith.” They professed to believe in Christ, and their active obedience showed, that their faith was living, and “worked by love” of Christ, and his ministers, truth, and cause: (Notes, Gal. 5:1-6. Jam. 2:14-26.) and that this powerful principle of holy love induced them to “labor” strenuously, in all things connected with the honor of Christ, and the benefit and comfort of their brethren. (Marg. Ref. g-k.) They professed all to “hope” in the promises of God, and to expect eternal life, as his gift in Christ Jesus; and this living hope rendered them “patient,” and constant in their adherence to him, amidst tribulations and persecutions. (Marg. Ref. l, m.--Notes, Rom. 5:3-5. 1 Cor. 15:55-58. Heb. 6:16-20. Jam. 1:1-4. 5:7-11.) These graces and duties they attended to, as “in the sight of God,” even their reconciled Father; and the apostle was satisfied, from what he had witnessed, that they were his “brethren beloved,” and “the elect of God” in Jesus Christ. This he did not speak as a matter of immediate revelation: but his favorable conclusion respecting them was drawn, by tracing back the effects of divine grace in their conversion, to the source of them in “their election of God.” (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Phil. 1:3-8. 2 Pet. 1:5-11.)—The purpose of God, in calling the Gentiles collectively, could not be known in this manner; and indeed some of the Thessalonians were Jewish converts. And in what sense a remnant of Thessalonians, (that is, a small proportion of the inhabitants of one city,) could prove the national election of the Macedonians, those who adopt this opinion would do well to inform us. Some explain the words, to mean election to external privileges, as Israel had been chosen: (Notes, Rom. 9:6-23.) but an external profession of Christianity was sufficient to prove this; whereas the apostle grounds his confidence respecting the Thessalonians, on “their work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope,” “things which,” no doubt, “accompany salvation.” (Notes, Rom. 8:28-31. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. Heb. 6:9-12.)—He had once indeed had his fears of them; but subsequent tidings from them had fully satisfied him: (3:5-7.) yet, if any individuals did not show the same “active faith, laborious love, and patient

7 So that ye were <sup>b</sup> ensamples to all that believe, <sup>c</sup> in Macedonia and Achaia.

8 For <sup>d</sup> from you sounded out the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also <sup>e</sup> in every place your faith to <sup>f</sup> God-ward is spread abroad; so that we need not to speak any thing.

Note.—The confidence of the apostle concerning the Christians at Thessalonica, as to their "election of God," was grounded on what he had witnessed: for the gospel, which he and his fellow-laborers preached, had come to them, "not in word only;" it had not been left to its natural efficacy, or merely to the power of arguments and persuasion, on their minds. Numbers had thus heard it in many places, who nevertheless continued to live in idolatry and iniquity: but "it had come with power, and with the Holy Ghost," or 'with power, even 'with the Holy Spirit.' This cannot relate to miracles exclusively; for numbers saw miracles, who notwithstanding continued unbelievers: but the new-creating power of the Holy Spirit, accompanying the word of God, had produced such a full conviction of its nature and importance, and such an assurance of faith and hope, as had induced the Thessalonians, at all events, to embrace and profess the gospel; even as a ship is carried, by a full tide and a fair wind, over every obstacle, into the haven. 'A metaphor taken from ships, when they are carried 'on under full sails.' Leigh. (Marg. Ref. o—s.)—For "they knew" and observed, "what manner of men" the preachers of Christianity "were among them for their sakes;" while they witnessed their patience, self-denial, diligence, zeal, holiness, and love; and how they labored with their own hands for a maintenance, that they might not be burdensome to the converts: and this induced them to attend to their doctrine. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, 2:9—12. 2 Thees. 3:6—9.)—They not only appeared "holy men of God" to others; but were evidently such among their most intimate companions. Thus the Thessalonians were induced to join themselves to these despised servants of a crucified Saviour; they associated with them in divine worship; they copied their examples; and in doing so, they became imitators of the Lord himself. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, 1 Cor. 11:1. Phil. 3:17—19. 4:8, 9. Tit. 2:7,8.) They indeed received the word into their hearts amidst great afflictions in their circumstances, and from their persecutors: yet they had such joy from the Holy Spirit, as made them ample amends. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Note, 2 Cor. 8:1—5.) In this manner they became examples, not only to their idolatrous neighbors, but even to believers in other parts of Macedonia, and in Achaia: for the gospel was soon spread from Thessalonica into those regions, perhaps by persons who went out for that purpose. In all places, whither the apostle also travelled, the report of the conversion and good conduct of the Thessalonians had arrived before him; and those who came to him from other parts, declared the same to him.

spirits,) to "serve" and worship "the one living and true God," by faith in Christ; and to wait for the Saviour's coming from heaven to raise the dead and judge the world, in believing and patient hope, diligent preparation, and universal conscientiousness. To this wrath, both Jews and Gentiles had been justly exposed for their sins; and under this they must all have finally perished, if the Son of God had not become incarnate, performed his suretyship obedience to the law, laid down his life as a Sacrifice for sin, risen as "the First-fruits of the resurrection," ascended into heaven to be the Advocate of sinners, sent forth his gospel to call men to partake of this salvation, and accompanied it by the power of his Spirit, to overcome the proud and carnal opposition of their hearts. Thus he had "delivered" believers from the merited wrath of God, which is coming, and will for ever be coming, upon all impenitent and unbelieving sinners. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Note, Matt. 3:7—10.) Of this deliverance their conversion was the sure evidence, and having this earnest and pledge of final salvation, they waited in joyful hope for that solemn season, which will complete the felicity of believers, and the destruction of the wicked. ### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It excites cordial joy and fervent gratitude, in faithful ministers, when they witness "the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope in the Lord Jesus," of those among whom they have preached the gospel. This puts vigor into their prayers and praises for them; as evidencing that they are "in God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ," partakers of "mercy, grace, and peace," "beloved brethren," and "the elect of God." But faith which works not obedience, professed love that declines self-denying labor, and hope which is separated from "patient continuance in well-doing," can never prove a man's "election;" all other ways of proving it are vain and delusory; and this scriptural medium is not capable of being perverted.—Alas! even the gospel, which the apostle preached, often "comes in word only;" and thus men continue impenitent and slaves to sin; or at most, become only notional formalists and mere professors of the gospel. This should excite all who preach and all who love the gospel, to "pray without ceasing," that it may every where, and at all times, be attended by the divine power of the Holy Spirit; producing, in the minds and hearts of men, that "full assurance" of its truth and importance, which alone can prevail with them to break through all hindrances, and make all sacrifices, that they may follow Christ and be partakers of his salvation. (Notes, Rom. 1:13—16. 1 Cor. 1:25. 2:3—5. 2 Cor. 4:7. 10:1—6.) This is "the work of God;" but he works by means: and when ministers evidently set before the people such an edifying example, that by imitating them they imitate Christ also, it is very conducive to their conviction and conversion.—When this happy change is effected, and sinners join themselves to those who "walk as Christ walked;" they are often enabled to "receive the word," amidst poverty, contempt, and manifold afflictions and persecutions, with abundant "joy in the Holy Ghost." Thus they become good examples to their families and neighbors, and even to their fellow Christians: the word of God sounds forth from them to others; and they zealously embrace every opportunity of diffusing this heavenly light. And when great numbers of careless, ignorant, and immoral persons, are turned from their idols and iniquities, their worldly pursuits and connexions, "to serve the living and true God;" to believe in and obey the Lord Jesus; to "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts; to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world;" and to "wait for the Lord Jesus from heaven," as 'believing 'that he will come to be their Judge,' and hoping and earnestly praying 'to be numbered with 'his saints in glory everlasting;' the fact speaks for itself: there needs little pains to spread the report, for it is a work of God which will be sure to be known, and rendered conspicuous by its own light. May he then send forth ministers into all parts of the world, attended by his power, and thus made abundantly successful, in the conversion of the nations to the worship of the living God, and the obedience of faith in his beloved Son!—But let us remember, "that the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." (Note, Rom. 1:18—20.) All temporal miseries, terminating in death, are the effects of that wrath: Jesus did not come to deliver us from these sufferings, but from "the wrath to come," the everlasting misery of hell. None but Jesus can deliver any man from this merited condemnation: all who believe in him, with an obedient faith, are delivered from it, and on all others "the wrath of God still abideth." For if indeed all true Christians once were exposed to this wrath; all they, whom "Jesus has not delivered," must be still exposed to it. (Notes, John 3:19—21, 27—36, v. 36.) Let us then examine this infinitely important matter, with proportionable seriousness and fervency of prayer; let us "give diligence to make our calling and election sure;" and if we have obtained this assurance, let us remember the price which our deliverance cost the great Redeemer, that humble love may constrain us devotedly to obey him, and cheerfully to suffer for him. But, if any are conscious that they have not experienced this deliverance, let them take warning, without delay, "to flee from the wrath to come," and to seek refuge in Christ and his salvation. (Note, Heb. 6:16—20.)

CHAP. II.

The apostle reminds the Thessalonians of his affectionate, faithful labors, and holy manner of life, among them, 1—12. He expresses his satisfaction, as to the manner in which they had received the gospel, and their constancy amidst persecution, 13,14: and speaks of the guilt and ruin of the unbelieving Jews, especially for opposing the gospel's being preached to the Gentiles, 15,16. He shows his joy on the account of the Thessalonians; his desire of seeing them again, and his hope of a joyful meeting at the coming of Christ, 17—20.

FOR yourselves, brethren, know <sup>a</sup> our entrance in unto you, that it was not <sup>b</sup> in vain:

2 But even after that we had suffered before, and were <sup>c</sup> shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were <sup>d</sup> bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with <sup>e</sup> much contention.

3 For <sup>f</sup>our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile:

4 But as <sup>g</sup> we were allowed of God <sup>h</sup> to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak; <sup>i</sup> not as pleasing men, <sup>k</sup> but God which trieth our hearts.

7 But <sup>t</sup> we were gentle among you, even <sup>u</sup> as a nurse cherisheth her children:

8 So, being <sup>v</sup> affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, <sup>w</sup> but also our own souls, because ye were <sup>x</sup> dear unto us.

Note.—The Christians at Thessalonica well knew, that the apostle and his fellow-laborers did not come among them with empty speculations, or in an inefficacious manner; but they were sensible, that it was a well-grounded testimony, and not a vague report, which had been spread abroad concerning them: and by the external proof of miracles, and the internal efficacy of divine grace, it had been rendered successful. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 13—16, v. 16. 1:9,10. Is. 55:10—13.) For he and his company having been, by immediate revelation, directed to go into Macedonia; they did not yield to discouraging fears, even when they had suffered the most severe, ignominious, and iniquitous usage at Philippi: (Notes, Acts 16:6—12,19—28,35—40.) but as soon as they were set at liberty, they came to Thessalonica; and there boldly, in dependence on God and from zeal for his glory, they preached that gospel, of which he was the Author. (Note, Acts 17:1—9.) This they did, with great earnestness of spirit, and strong desires of usefulness; and with the most constant perseverance, notwithstanding the opposition of the Jews, the disputings which they were constrained to maintain with them, and the persecutions which they endured. (Marg. Ref. c—e.) For their exhortations were not suited to beguile men, either into erroneous and delusive opinions, or licentious practices; nor had they any sinister or selfish motives. On the contrary, they were most fully assured of the divine authority and excellency of the doctrine which they taught; and conscious of the utmost integrity, purity, and sincerity, in their endeavors to propagate it. For as they had been "approved by God" himself, and marked out to be "stewards of his mysteries," and intrusted with the gospel; so they had spoken with the most simple and sincere desire of approving themselves faithful to him, and meeting with his acceptance; knowing that he would scrutinize, and prove as by fire, the secret intentions of every heart. (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. 4:3—5. Rev. 2:20—23, v. 23.) They had not indeed at all sought to "please men," for the sake of their own ease, interest, reputation, or accommodation; or in any way, except as conducive to their edification. (Notes, Rom. 15:1—3. 1 Cor. 4:1—5. Gal. 1:6—10.) They had never, on any occasion, employed "flattering words," to soothe their hearers into a delusive opinion of their own good estate or character, to palliate their sins, or to commend their endowments or virtues. (Notes, Job 32:18—22. Prov. 29:5.) This the Thessalonians knew; being sensible, that they addressed them in the plainest and most convincing language; and "God himself was witness," that they had never made religion, or their ministry, "a cloke" to cover any avaricious designs. Nor had they courted applause, or aimed at popularity, or aspired at authority and honor, among them or any other Christians; on the contrary, they even receded from their due, and would not burden them by requiring a maintenance. This was a mark of respect, which the other apostles generally received from the churches; and Paul had as just a claim to it as they: but he did not insist upon it, either for himself or his companions; because he was aware, that it would have been "burdensome" to the people, as they were in

In this and in all other respects, they had imitated “the gentleness” of a nursing mother, to her own beloved infant; whom she deems it a pleasure to suckle and attend on, and has the desired recompense of her disinterested assiduity, when it thrives and is in health. Thus, being “affectionately desirous” of their spiritual growth and prosperity, they were not only willing to impart the gospel to them; but the tenderest feelings of their hearts accompanied their labors. They readily spent their strength, employed all their knowledge and ability, exhausted their spirits, and even ventured their lives for them, “because they were become dear to them:” and they desired no other recompense, than the “furtherance and joy of faith” of their beloved people. 9 For ye remember, brethren, <sup>z</sup> our labor and travail; for, laboring <sup>a</sup> night and day, because we would not be <sup>b</sup> chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you <sup>c</sup> the gospel of God.

10 Ye are <sup>d</sup> witnesses, and God also, <sup>e</sup> how holily, and justly, and unblamably, we behaved ourselves among you that believe:

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Thessalonians could well remember the disinterested and fatiguing labor of the apostle and his fellow-laborers: for they not only employed the day, in the various parts of their ministerial duty, or in working for a subsistence; but they bereaved themselves of rest, often spending the whole or a considerable part of the night, in the same manner: lest, by being “chargeable unto any of” their hearers, they should prevent their own success. (Marg. Ref. z—b.—Note, 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) Thus they faithfully preached to them the gospel of God: and the Thessalonians could testify, (as the Lord himself also would,) in what a holy, upright, and blameless manner they behaved themselves: not only in those things which unbelievers might have noticed, but also in their most retired and intimate behavior among such as believed the gospel: so that none of them had seen any thing, but what evinced the greatest purity, probity, sincerity, and holy love. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Note, 1:5—8.) They had also exhorted and animated them, with every affectionate and consolatory topic, and “charged” them with all authority, as testifying the will of God concerning them, to copy their example. This they did, not only in general, publicly, but privately to “every one of them,” as the case might require. And as a wise and affectionate father uses arguments, persuasions, encouragements, and commands, in directing the conduct of his children; so they had used the same means, of inducing them to walk worthy of the holy perfections of that God whom they worshipped, the example of his love and mercy to them, and their immense obligations to him; who had so graciously translated them from “the power of darkness into the kingdom of his dear Son,” that they might be trained up on earth, for the eternal glory and holy felicity of heaven. without ceasing, <sup>m</sup> because when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, <sup>n</sup> the word of God, which <sup>o</sup> effectually worketh also in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, <sup>p</sup> became followers of <sup>q</sup> the churches of God, which in Judea <sup>r</sup> are Christ Jesus: for <sup>s</sup> ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, <sup>t</sup> even as they have of the Jews,

15 Who both <sup>u</sup> killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have * persecuted us; and they <sup>x</sup> please not God, and are <sup>y</sup> contrary to all men:

Note.—The apostle and his friends thanked God continually, because the Christians at Thessalonica when they received “the word of God, which they had heard from them, did not receive it as the word of man.” This might be disputed against, rejected, or even derided; or it might be received and believed in part, but not wholly or implicitly, without material criminality or detriment, however plausible or ingenious it were. On the contrary, “they had received it as the word of God,” which it certainly was; and had accordingly revered it, submitted to it, and implicitly obeyed it. Thus it had effectually wrought in their hearts, repentance of sin, hatred of idolatry, faith in Christ, love to him and his cause, delight in the worship and service of God, a supreme valuation of his favor, and a realizing view of eternal things. (Marg. Ref. 1—o.—Notes, 1: 5—8. Rom. 1:13—16. Col. 1:3—8.) In this manner, they became “imitators” of the Christian churches in Judea, in doctrine, worship, and holy obedience: and they adhered to the truth and will of Christ, patiently and cheerfully, amidst the persecutions which they endured from their neighbors and countrymen, as instigated by the unbelieving Jews; even as the Christians in Judea were hated and persecuted, by those of their own nation. (Marg. Ref. p—t.—Note, Acts 17:5—9.) Nor should this excite any astonishment; seeing the Jews, though professed worshippers of the one living and true God, had murdered the promised Messiah, as their ancestors had the prophets; and they persecuted the apostles and disciples of Christ, from a proud and blind zeal for the ritual law, and the traditions of the elders. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, Matt. 23:29—39. Acts 7:51—60.) In this, they were far indeed from pleasing God, as some of them vainly imagined; (Notes, John 16:1—3. Acts 26:9—11.) nay, they exceedingly provoked him; and they “were contrary to all men,” and opposed, as much as possible, the salvation both of Jews and Gentiles: especially, as they prohibited, and did all in their power to hinder, the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles; as if they could not endure that they should be saved. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) Thus, with ceaseless efforts, they “filled up the measure” of their personal and national iniquities, for which the wrath of God was, even then, about to come upon them to the uttermost, in the destruction of the city and temple; the slaughter of immense multitudes of the nation, the scattering, enslaving, and abject miseries of the survivors; and the most unheard of calamities of every kind, pursuing them into every region of the earth, throughout numerous successive generations, even to this day. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Dan. 9:24—27. Zech. 5:5—11. Matt. 24: Mark 13: Luke 21:)—The morose and unsocial bigotry of the Jews, respecting all Gentiles, from the time when they ceased to copy their idolatries, is largely insisted on by commentators in general; and the testimony of Gentiles is adduced in proof of it. This evidence, however, is not much to be regarded: for if the Jews had shown the most compassionate, liberal, and friendly attention to idolaters in temporal things; while they steadily adhered to the divine law, by separating from them in all things relating to religion; the clamor of the Gentiles against their bigotry would not have been silenced, if it had been even abated. The steady refusal of what some have called an intercommunity of deities and religious rites, would have sufficed to keep up the prejudice against Jews, and the disdain of them, among the proud Greeks and Romans; for the same reasons, that no philanthropy or liberality can exempt those from contempt and reproach, even among professed Christians, who unreservedly avow their attachment to the doctrines of the gospel as their rule of faith, and the precepts of Christ as their rule of conduct. The Jews were, however, in this respect, very blamable; and so are many Christians: but the grand point, which here demands consideration, is this; that the determined opposition of the Jewish nation, to the preaching of the gospel among the Gentiles, was the immediate cause of “wrath coming on them to the uttermost.” Let Britain, let every inhabitant of Britain, tremble at the thought, of opposing the cause of missions among the heathen, as too many are disposed to do, “lest wrath come upon us also to the uttermost.”—“They who obstruct the progress of the gospel, and persecute the promoters of it, are the ministers of Satan, and therefore bear his name” (18). Whitby.—It should also be distinctly noted, that the apostle does not give the least intimation, that the Gentiles could be saved by Christ, or in any other way, unless the gospel were preached to them. Note.—The apostle had been driven by violence from the Thessalonians; but his affections were still with them. The painful separation (for he had left them with as much reluctance as a parent parts with his children, whom he leaves as orphans in this evil world,) was only for a short season, or for "the space of one hour;" for the apostle's mind was 'full of the ideas of eternity, which did, as it were, annihilate any period of mortal life.' Doddridge. He had, however, been exceedingly desirous of returning to them, which he had attempted with abundant earnestness; (for in this he spake of himself, as Timothy had visited them again, and perhaps Silvanus also:) but Satan, by exciting disturbances and opposition to him at Berea and in other places, had hindered him from effecting his purpose, seeing he could not have come with propriety. (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, Zech. 3:1—5. Rom. 1:13—16.) Otherwise, they might be sure, that he gladly would have come, and that he would embrace the first opportunity of so doing. For what, did they suppose, was the object of his "hope," in the work of the ministry, but such success as he had met with among them? Or what was his "joy and crown of exultation," in that respect, but to see numbers of such affectionate converts to Christ as they were; whom he could look upon, as those in whom he should rejoice before the Lord Jesus, at his coming to judge the world? (Marg. Ref. i. l.—Note, 1:9,10. 4:13—18. Phil. 2:14—18.) For, indeed, he and his brethren did not "glory" or rejoice in their gifts, excellency of speech, or popularity and celebrity among men; but in being prospered by God, as his instruments in the conversion of sinners, and in encouraging believers to a holy walk and conversation. (Marg. Ref. m.—Note, 3:6—10.)—The fervor of affection, and the animation with which it is expressed, in this chapter, are incomparable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Confidence in God, zeal for his glory, love to the souls of men, and conscious integrity, will support faithful ministers amidst manifold hardships and sufferings: and when they have "suffered and been shamefully used" in one place, they will not at all be disposed to decline further labors and perils; but relying on the divine protection and support, they will be courageous in speaking the gospel of God in another situation. Even when their ministry excites the opposition of unbelievers, and constrains them to engage in argument, and to "contend earnestly" for the truth; though they love peace, and hate disputatious contests, they must persevere in their testimony; for they "cannot but speak the things which they have heard and known." (Note, Jude 3,4.)—All ministers should be careful, that their preaching be far removed from fallacy, deceit, and a licentious tendency; and that their motives be equally pure from all artful designs of advancing, enriching, or indulging themselves, by means of their ministry. For such scandalous discoveries have been made, respecting priests of different religions, and even the more plausible and earnest of them; that men are very apt to suspect some fraud, or corrupt intention, lurking under a great appearance of zeal and devotion. It is in vain to oppose arguments to this deep-rooted suspicion, except they are corroborated by manifest facts.—We ought to consider ourselves, as "allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel;" and recollect that this is the most important stewardship, which ever was or can be committed to man: our faithfulness in it will produce the happiest consequences to ourselves and others; our unfaithfulness will constitute the most aggravated guilt, and ensure the deepest condemnation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:1,2. 1 Tim. 6:20,21. 2 Tim. 1:11—14. 2:1, 2.) We should, therefore, by no means "seek to please men;" but simply study to "approve ourselves to God, who trieth the hearts." Even the approbation of pious men may be fallacious, and may interfere with our simplicity, in aiming to please the Lord by faithfulness to our trust. A man may indeed, by harshness and severity, in his manner of stating the truth, prevent his own usefulness; but selfish principles will far more generally lead men to temporize, to palliate, and to "speak smooth things." This strain tends to bring the hearers into a good humor with themselves, and that makes them friendly to the preacher; which may be greatly conducive to his popularity and secular advantage, and for a time even add to his reputation. It is therefore a very great thing indeed, for a minister to be able on good grounds to say, "Neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness, God is witness; nor of men sought we glory:" and to be able, to appeal both to the Lord and to men, that he has constantly receded even from his equitable claims, out of love to the souls of his hearers, and lest he should be "furtherness to them." But, when this decided faithfulness, this unambitious, disinterested, and self-denying "plainness of speech," on all occasions, unites with equal tenderness and affection; so that the same persons can say, "We were gentle among you, even as a nursing mother cherisheth her own children: so, being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us;" they the servants of Christ come as near to the mind of their Lord, as can be conceived attainable by mortal men. There are, however, but few, if any, who are not warped, either one way or the other, by constitution, habit, or circumstances: it behoves us therefore to search out our spirits, to be open to conviction, and to guard against our own peculiar weakness. (Note, Luke 9:51—56. P. O. 46—56.)—If we be desirous of the character of able, faithful, and affectionate ministers of Christ, we must not shrink from "labor and toil, day or night." We should cheerfully endure hardship, both in preaching the gospel; and also in diligent endeavors to "avoid being chargeable to" those, who are unable or unwilling to assist us: and we ought to aim at a noble ambition of being able to appeal to men, as well as unto God, that we have behaved ourselves with purity and equity, and in a blameless manner, among those with whom we were most intimately conversant. This will give energy to our words, whilst we "exhort, encourage, and charge" our people, to walk worthy of God, who "hath called them to his kingdom and glory." Indeed, we ought always to have their welfare at heart, as entirely as a good and wise father has that of his children; and to seek it, with the same affectionate and assiduous earnestness, from the most disinterested motives.

It is incumbent on us, to "give thanks to God without ceasing," in behalf of those, who receive the gospel from us, not as the opinion of fallible men, but as the "sure testimony of the Lord, which maketh wise the simple." This it most certainly is, as far as any man preaches according to the scriptures; however unlearned, obscure, or frail he may be. When thus received with reverent faith and obedient attention, it "works effectually" an entire change in the judgment, disposition, and characters of men: they become not so much followers of this or the other leader of a sect, as imitators of the primitive Christians, and so of Christ himself: and should in consequence expect to be reviled and persecuted by their neighbors, (as far as outward circumstances will admit,) even as the first converts to the gospel were by the Jews. For the same nature is in men, of every age and clime, which was in those "who killed the Lord Jesus and the holy prophets," and who "persecuted the apostles" and disciples of the Saviour: and Satan, who "worketh in the children of disobedience," hates the pure gospel of Christ, and the faithful preaching of it to sinners of all descriptions, as much as he did of old. But they who would forbid us thus to preach to "the chief of sinners," and to those who are dead in sin, and to send or carry the gospel, and the word of God to the heathen, "that they may be saved," do not in this "please God, and they are contrary to all men." The object and motives of those in general, who would hinder the publishing of the gospel, in any part of the world, are manifest: they idolize worldly interests, care little for the temporal good and nothing for the souls of men, and either hate or slight the genuine and unadulterated word of God. But it is grievous to think, that some apparently pious men, misled by an undue attachment to system, should in any way or degree, countenance the conduct of those, who in every age are actuated by the same worldly, proud, bigoted, and selfish spirit, which influenced the Jews of old, when filling up the measure of their sins, "till wrath came upon them to the uttermost."—The affectionate and faithful ministers of Christ may be forced from those, with whom their hearts are most united; and they may be frustrated, through the devices of Satan, in their most earnest desires and endeavors to come to them again: yet their separation will be only for a short space. Their "hope and joy" are intimately connected with the spiritual growth and fruitfulness of those who have profited by their labors. These are now "their crown of rejoicing and glorying," far more than all possible commendation from other men. (Note, Phil. 4:1.) And they will meet them, in the presence of the Lord Jesus, at his coming, as "their glory and joy:" and then all the pangs of their partings and separations will be richly and eternally compensated.

CHAP. III.

The apostle shows, that his care for the Christians at Thessalonica had induced him to send Timothy, to establish and encourage them, 1—5; whose good report concerning them had been a great comfort to him in his distresses, 6—8. He thanks God in their behalf, and shows how earnestly he desires to see them, 9, 10; and prays, that he may be enabled to visit them; and for their growth in holiness and love, and perseverance to the end, 11—13.

Note.—(Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Acts 17: 10—15. 18:1—6.) Timothy came from Berea to Athens, while Paul was there; but it seems that Silas did not.—The apostle, being anxious about the new converts at Thessalonica, could not endure to remain any longer in suspense, or to act as if he were unconcerned for their welfare: (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:12,13. 7:5—7.) he therefore decidedly chose and submissively acquiesced to be left alone at Athens, though that must have been very inconvenient to him: and he sent back Timothy to Thessalonica, to establish the Christians of that city in the faith, by suitable instructions which he was eminently qualified to give them; and to exhort and encourage them to hold fast their profession, whatever opposition they might meet with, by assuring them of peculiar protection, consolation, and reward. This was intended to prevent any of them from being “moved” to renounce or disguise their faith, by means of the afflictions to which it exposed them: for they could not but know, if they understood the nature of their profession, that the disciples of Christ were appointed to have fellowship with him in his sufferings. Their situation, amidst the enemies of God, and their doctrine and character, would render contempt and enmity unavoidable: Satan would certainly stir up persecutions as far as he could: and it pleased the Lord to appoint them a certain measure of suffering, for the trial of their faith, the progress of their sanctification, and the honor of the powerful and excellent effects of his grace in them. (Marg. Ref. c—h.—Notes, Matt. 5: 10—12. 10:21—23. John 15:17—21. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 3:10—12. Heb. 12:4—11.) This the apostle had plainly and confidently predicted, and warned them to expect, when he was with them, even before the persecution had begun: he had never allowed them to be deluded, by an expectation of peace or prosperity; but had taught them to look for tribulations from without, and for inward consolations. Accordingly it had come to pass: so that he and his helpers had been driven from them by furious persecutions. He had thus left them in the midst of a fiery trial; and he had sent to see how they had stood it, and whether their faith had thus been proved genuine: (Rom. 5:3—5. Jam. 1:1—4. 1 Pet. 1:6,7. 4:12—16.) for he could not wholly divest himself of solicitude, lest the tempter, even Satan, should have prevailed against them by his manifold artifices, to renounce the faith, and comply with the idolatry of their neighbors; and lest his unwearied labors for their eternal salvation should thus prove in vain. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Note, 1:1—4.)—Some would explain, what the apostle here speaks concerning persecution, exclusively of himself and the other apostles and evangelists; as if the enemies pleaded this argument against the divine original of Christianity: and as if the danger of the Thessalonians arose, not from any persecutions to which they themselves were exposed, but from the vain reasonings of their heathen neighbors, respecting those which the apostle endured, and his leaving Thessalonica on account of them. But the Thessalonians were themselves exposed to persecution; as all must expect to be “who live godly in Christ Jesus:” and what they suffered or dreaded would be at least as likely to “move them,” as any reasonings of their enemies; and such reasonings of philosophical opposers do not appear to have existed at so early a period. (Preface.—Notes, Acts 14:21—23. 2 Thes. 1:3,4.)

concerning the faith and love of the brethren in that city, and their affectionate remembrance of him, and earnest reciprocal desire to see him, were so entirely satisfactory; that they not only relieved his mind from anxiety, but abundantly compensated for all his other trials and distresses, and filled his benevolent heart with consolation. (Marg. Ref. o—u.—Note, 2 Cor. 7:5—7.) For indeed he seemed to enjoy life with great relish, and to live to some purpose, when his spiritual children “stood fast in the faith,” hope, love, and obedience of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Acts 11:23,24. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. 16:13,14. Phil. 4:1.) Nor could he find language sufficiently energetic to express the gratitude which he owed to God, and the thanks which he was excited to render him, on their account; and for that overflowing joy, with which this inspired his heart before God: whilst night and day he poured out his unremitted prayers, that he might have the satisfaction of once again seeing them, and of perfecting what was wanting in their faith, whether in respect of knowledge in the testimonies and promises of God; or the realizing assurance, with which they credited them, and depended on them. (Marg. Ref. z—e.)—“Es- thus observes, from the 9th verse, that both the apostle’s joy, and their faith and constancy, were the gift of God: ... for giving of thanks is not except for benefits received. He might ‘also have observed the excellent pattern the apostle here gives to all the bishops and pastors of the church, to be continually solicitous to know of the welfare of their flock; incessantly praying for it, blessing God daily for it, and looking upon it as the very felicity of their ‘own lives.’ Whitby.

Note.—The apostle closed the expressions of his affectionate and pious fervor of holy exultation, by pouring out the requests of his heart for the Christians at Thessalonica. He earnestly besought “God, even our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ as the incarnate Son, and as Head over all things to the church,” to direct, and make plain his way unto them, by removing all those providential hindrances which had hitherto prevented him. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) He also entreated the Lord Jesus, (for as the former clause is an undeniable act of divine worship rendered to Christ as One with the Father, so this also seems to have been immediately addressed to him, Note, 2 Thes. 2:16,17.) that by further communications from his fulness, he would cause them to “increase in love of one another, and of all men,” not excepting their persecutors; according to the various exercises of that holy affection, required by the commandments of God; and to “abound in this love,” according to the nature and measure of the apostle’s fervent, spiritual, and enlarged love of them. (Marg. Ref. i—m.—Notes, 4:9—12. Phil. 1:9—11. 2 Thes. 1:3,4. 1 Pet. 1:22.) This he desired, in order to the “establishment of their hearts in holiness;” and that their affections, tempers, and conduct, might be “unblamable,” in every part of their various duties to God, towards each other, and towards all men, in the several relations of life; and that it might at last be manifested that they were so, as in the presence of their holy and heart-searching God and Father, in that decisive day, “when the Lord Jesus shall come with all his holy ones,” whether angels or redeemed sinners, to “judge the quick and dead.” For the souls of the redeemed, who have died in the Lord, will descend with him from heaven, to be re-united to their glorified bodies; and the saints on earth will be changed, and meet the Lord in the air. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The love which zealous ministers of Christ bear to their people, and the longing desires after their salvation which they experience and desire to cherish, cannot wholly be separated from painful solicitude on their account. This often disposes them to renounce their own convenience, and to endure additional fatigue, in order to obtain satisfaction concerning them, and to promote their spiritual benefit. And it is a great advantage for such as are engaged at a distance from those, of whom they are thus “affectionately desirous,” to have faithful fellow-laborers, whom they may employ in “establishing and comforting them concerning their faith.”—In the most peaceful times, every Christian should “count his cost,” and remember that the followers of Christ are “appointed to suffer” affliction: (Note, Luke 14:25—33.) and ministers should not shun to forewarn their hearers; that they may be prepared for the cross, and meet every trial with watchfulness and prayer: as in this manner they will best be preserved constant and "steadfast in the faith." For the tempter has many artful devices: he knows how to suit his suggestions to men's dispositions, and to avail himself of their circumstances; and he will be sure to work on their hopes, fears, desires, or aversions, by the most subtle methods imaginable. So many indeed, who for a time made a creditable profession of the gospel, have been overcome in the day of trial, that the experienced minister will generally feel a degree of anxiety: and he will not fail to caution the people to be on their guard, "lest by any means the tempter should tempt them, and his labor should be in vain." But in proportion to these solitudes will be his rejoicing, when he finds that his beloved children "stand fast in the faith," and walk in love; and that their remembrance of him, and affection to him, correspond with his feelings towards them. In proportion as he has the mind of St. Paul, (that is, the mind of Christ, Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) he will be "comforted over them, in all his affliction and distress by their faith:" the pleasure of his life will greatly consist in seeing them "stand fast in the Lord," walking in his ordinances and commandments blameless, and in no degree moved by the reproaches of their enemies. He will feel, that he can never sufficiently "thank God for all the joy which" he derives from them, and the testimony of the acceptance of his labors which their conversion implies: and if he be absent from them, such good tidings of them will draw out his soul in more fervent prayers to God continually; that he may again enjoy the comfort of their beloved society, and "perfect what is lacking in their faith," to whatever hardships or perils this may expose him. Thus will he beseech "God, even our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, to direct his way unto them;" that he may again on earth meet with those, whom he so tenderly loves: and that especially, the Lord would make them to "increase and abound in love one towards another, and towards all men;" and thus (for "love is the fulfilling of the law,") "establish their hearts unblamable in holiness, before God our Father, at the coming of the Lord Jesus, with all his saints;" when all such desires and prayers will fully be accomplished.—May the Lord make all, who are called the ministers of Christ, partakers of this faithful, loving, diligent, and disinterested spirit! May he prosper all their labors and "comfort their hearts," with numbers of converts like these Thessalonians; and may he send forth numbers of such laborers into all the nations of the earth!

CHAP. IV.

The apostle earnestly exhorts his brethren, to increasing diligence in obeying Christ, 1, 2; and to chastity, and integrity in all things; as God had called them to holiness: and those who despised these admonitions, would despise God himself, 3—8. He calls on them to "abound more and more in love" of one another, 9, 10; to be industrious in their respective callings, 11, 12; and to moderate their sorrow for deceased believers, from assured expectation of the coming of Christ to raise the dead, to change the living, and to receive all his people to himself, 13—18.

FURTHERMORE then <sup>a</sup> we * beseech you, brethren, and † exhort you <sup>b</sup> by the Lord Jesus, that as <sup>c</sup> ye have received of us how <sup>d</sup> ye ought to walk, and <sup>e</sup> to please God, <sup>f</sup> so ye would abound more and more.

2 For ye know <sup>g</sup> what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus.

4 That every one of you <sup>l</sup> should know how to possess <sup>m</sup> his vessel in sanctification and <sup>n</sup> honor;

5 Not <sup>o</sup> in the lust of concupiscence, even <sup>p</sup> as the Gentiles which <sup>q</sup> know not God.

Note.—It was further needful for the apostle to "entreat" the Thessalonians, with the most affectionate persuasions, and to "exhort" them with earnestness and authority, "to abound more and more" in the practice of all those duties, concerning which he had instructed them, when at Thessalonica. They had "received" these instructions, in an obedient and teachable manner; and thus had learned how they ought to order their whole conduct, that they might "please God" in all their actions: and he now called upon them to be still more zealous in every good work, and assiduous in cultivating every holy disposition. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—f.—Notes, Rom. 12:1,2. Col. 1:9—14.) It was indeed unnecessary for him to enter into an exact detail of particulars; as they "knew what commandments he had given them in the name" and by the authority "of the Lord Jesus." (Marg. Ref. g.—Note, Matt. 28:19,20, v. 20.) For "their sanctification," or entire separation from all evil, and consecration to God; the complete mortification of the old corrupt nature, and the renewal of their souls to the divine image, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, through faith, constituted "the will of God" respecting them.—It was especially incumbent upon them "to abstain from fornication," as well as from adultery, and all other licentiousness, which was generally practised among the Gentiles: (Notes, Rom. 1:24—27. Eph. 4:17—19. Col. 3:5,6. 1 Pet. 4:3—5.) that so every one of them might understand in what manner to possess his body, the receptacle of his rational soul, in a sanctified and honorable use of all its members, as "instruments of righteousness unto God," (Notes, Rom. 6:12,13,16—19. 1 Cor. 6:18—20.) and in an exact government of every sense and appetite, according to the divine law, and the

Note.—In like manner, the apostle warned the Thessalonians, not to over-reach, or defraud, their brethren or neighbors in any transaction; either by taking advantage of their ignorance, necessity, or credulity; by exacting immoderate profits; or by any of those artifices and subterfuges, which selfishness devises to impose upon the unwary, without ruining men’s credit, or incurring punishment by human laws. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ec. 20:15. 1 Cor. 6:7—11.) Such dishonest persons might not be detected, or could not be called to account, by men; but the Lord would not suffer their hypocrisy and injustice to escape with impunity; being himself “the Avenger of all” clandestine frauds and impositions, as well as of open injustice and oppression. (Marg. Ref. s.) Of this the apostle had before warned the Thessalonians, when he was with them; and he had testified, that these practices should not escape the vengeance of God. For he had not called them into his family, in order to give them a license to live in an unholiness manner, either by gratifying their sensual appetites, or their avarice; but that they might be taught, inclined, and enabled, to walk before him in holiness. (Marg. Ref. t, u.)—The word “uncleanness,” here used, has led many learned expositors to explain the sixth verse of clandestine adultery. But, if fornication were forbidden, adultery must be of course; for even the Gentiles condemned adultery, while they connived at fornication: nay, in fact, they sanctioned it, when committed only with slaves and courtezans: as it is evident from the writings of Demosthenes, Cicero, and others. This interpretation is far from the most obvious meaning of the passage; dishonesty is as inconsistent with Christianity, as licentiousness; and, in this over-reaching, fraudulent manner, perhaps even more common: and the word “uncleanness” may either be referred to what went before, or be understood as a general word for wickedness, all which is filthiness in the sight of God.—Notwithstanding, the excellent state of the Thessalonian church, some might have found admission into it, who would speak of the doctrines and comforts of Christianity, and yet affect to despise these practical exhortations, as inconsistent with the grace and liberty of the gospel: but the apostle reminded them, that in so doing, they did not despise him, or Silvanus, or Timothy; but God himself, who had given them his Holy Spirit, by whose inspiration these exhortations had been written.—“In this passage St. Paul asserts his own inspiration, ‘in the strongest terms, and with the greatest solemnity.’ Macknight.

12 That <sup>k</sup> ye may walk honestly toward <sup>l</sup> them that are without, and that ye may have lack of * nothing.

Note.—In respect of “the new commandment,” which Christ had given his disciples, of “loving one another,” (Note, John 13:31—35.) the apostle need not write to the Thessalonians, concerning the ground, nature, exercises, fruits, and blessed effects of it: for they were “taught of God,” by the illumination and sanctification of the Holy Spirit, thus to do; as it was an essential part of that holy state of the mind and affections which constituted “the new man,” and counteracted and overpowered the selfishness of “the old man.” (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 1 John 3:13—17.) Indeed, they did exercise “brotherly love,” not only among one another, but towards all the Christians of the several churches in Macedonia; yet he would exhort them to “increase more and more,” in the fervency of their love, and in all the fruits of it. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, 3:11—13. Phil. 1:9—11. 2 Thes. 1:3, 4.) While men in general aspired to eminence, reputation, or authority, by an intermeddling and turbulent conduct, both in public and private stations, it should be their “ambition,” to behave quietly, peaceably, and contentedly, in their own situations, however low and obscure; and to attend diligently to their proper work, in the community, in the church, and in relative life. And, as most of them were poor, or might be reduced to poverty for conscience’ sake in one way or other, they ought to be industrious in manual labor, as the apostle had commanded them, at the time when he labored for his bread among them. Thus they would be enabled to act honorably and creditably, among their unbelieving neighbors; paying all their dues, maintaining their families decently, and being preserved from seeking relief by any disgraceful services or compliances; as not having any want of things suited to their station, or requisite in order to relieve one another in their distresses. 13 ¶ But <sup>m</sup> I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them <sup>n</sup> which are asleep, that <sup>o</sup> ye sorrow not, even as others <sup>p</sup> which have no hope.

14 For <sup>q</sup> if we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even so them also which <sup>r</sup> sleep in Jesus will <sup>s</sup> God bring with him.

17 Then <sup>e</sup> we which are alive and remain, shall be <sup>f</sup> caught up together with them <sup>g</sup> in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: <sup>h</sup> and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

Note.—(Notes, 1 Cor. 15:20—28,50—54.) Perhaps the apostle heard, that some of the Thessalonian believers had lately died, or suffered martyrdom; and that their relatives and brethren were greatly dejected about them, not duly attending to the consolations suggested by the gospel. He therefore “would not have them to be ignorant concerning those who were asleep” in Christ, that they were in a safe and happy state: seeing it was not proper for them to sorrow on these occasions, in so disconsolate a manner, or with such outward expressions of violent grief, as those who had no hope respecting their deceased friends, or expectation of meeting them again, were used to do. (Marg. Ref. m. o, p.—Notes, Prov. 14:32. Eph. 2:11—13.) For “since” they believed “that Jesus” died for their “sins, and rose again, for their justification;” they might thence assuredly infer, that God would raise again incorruptible the bodies of those who slept in Jesus; that they might be produced with him and presented by him, at the last day. Death was become only a sleep “through Jesus,” as the body felt no pain, and the soul was present with the Lord in holiness and felicity. (Marg. Ref. n. q.—Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—3. Phil. 1:21—26.) He must therefore “say unto them, by the word of the Lord;” or by immediate revelation, that such of the whole multitude of believers, as should be found alive at his coming, would not enter into the full enjoyment of heavenly felicity, in body and soul, before their brethren, who had previously died and been buried. (Marg. Ref. t—y.) For at that solemn period, “the Lord Jesus” will be seen to “descend from heaven,” with the acclamations of attending angels, “and the spirits of just men made perfect,” and “the voice of the archangel,” who will be appointed to lead the hierarchies of heaven, on this illustrious occasion; and with “the trumpet of God,” sounding in a manner similar to what it did from mount Sinai, but doubtless far more loud and tremendous. (Marg. Ref. z—c.—Note, Ex. 19:16—20.) Then, “all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth;” but “the dead in Christ shall rise first,” and be rendered incorruptible, even before their brethren who never died shall be changed. Immediately after, these “will be changed,” and their bodies become immortal and spiritual. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—54. Phil. 3:20,21.) Thus will they be suddenly taken up together into “the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air;” that, being approved as heirs of the kingdom, the whole company may be his assessors in judgment, and then re-enter heaven with him triumphantly: and “so will they be for ever with the Lord.” Wherefore the apostle exhorted the Thessalonians to comfort and encourage themselves and each other with these animating topics, under the loss of their brethren, the prospect of death, and all their trials and sorrows. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—i.)—Some suppose, that the apostle expected to live till the day of Judgment, because he spoke in the first person plural concerning those who should be alive at that time; but he elsewhere spoke of being absent from the body, and of being “raised up with Jesus.” (2 Cor. 4:14. 5:8.) He was one, who remained alive after others had been removed; his faith and hope annihilated, as it were, the intervening space; his love made him consider the cause of the whole multitude as his own; and it is evident that he did not speak it personally of himself: for when the Thessalonians imagined that “the day of judgment was at hand,” he diligently set himself to rectify that mistake. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:1,2.) As the apostle expressly declares, that he spake “by the word of the Lord,” or by divine inspiration; the consequences of allowing him to be mistaken in what he said, should very seriously be considered. Similar expressions may be found in other parts of scripture. (Psa. 66:6. 81:5. Hos. 12:4.)—Some suppose, that Christ himself was meant by “the archangel,” being “the ruler of all angels;” but, as we must understand the words, “the Lord,” of him; it seems not natural to explain another term in the same sentence of him likewise: and many intimations are given of different ranks and orders among the holy angels. (Comp. 2 Pet. 2:11. with Jude 9.—Notes, Eph. 1:15—23, v. 21. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 3:21,22, v. 21. Jude 9,10.)—The resurrection of believers is exclusively meant, as every attentive reader must perceive; and therefore all speculations concerning the bodies with which the wicked shall arise, (a subject on which the scripture observes a profound silence,) must be wholly foreign to the subject. (Notes, Eph. 1:21. 3:9. 1 Pet. 3:22.) The notions which prevailed among the Gentiles, left them totally destitute of a firm, well-grounded, and animating hope of again meeting their deceased friends, in a state of happiness: and so do the notions on these subjects of merely nominal Christians.—Some expositors have said, that the expression, “So shall we ever be with the Lord,” implies that the souls of believers are not previously, at least not permanently, with him: but has not the apostle expressly assured us of the contrary? #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The ministers of Christ are bound to instruct their flocks, not only in the great doctrines and promises of the gospel; but also in every part of their duty, that they may “know how they ought to walk and to please God:” and Christians should as readily receive these instructions, as they do the most encouraging declarations of saving grace, and everlasting love. They should also take in good part the earnest, repeated, affectionate, and authoritative exhortations of their pastors; when they “beseech and charge” them to abound “more and more” in every good work, according to “the commandments given them in the name of the Lord Jesus.” For, as all men come far short of absolute perfection; zealous ministers cannot be fully satisfied with the present measure of the people’s fruitfulness, any more than humble Christians are with their own attainments.—“The will of God,” as revealed in his holy law, and in his precious promises, implies his purpose of their complete sanctification: (Notes, Psa. 130:7,8. 2 Pet. 1:3,4.) we should therefore diligently follow after perfect holiness. And it may encourage those, who long for more entire sanctification, to reflect, that, in this respect, their will and that of God are now coincident. In aspiring after this renewal of the soul unto holiness, the strictest restraints must be imposed upon the appetites and senses of the body, and upon all those thoughts and inclinations of the mind, which are connected with them: that, not only “fornication” and gross transgressions may be abstained from; but that every one “may know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honor;” at a distance from “the lust of concupiscence,” which so shamefully degrades the immense numbers of those “who know not God.” It is a deep disgrace to a rational creature to be a slave to his animal inclinations, and to act contrary to his better judgment, his true interest, or the welfare of his neighbor, for the sake of gratifications, of which the beasts are equally capable: but it is far more dishonorable for a spiritual man, a child of God, a member of Christ, a temple of the Holy Spirit, and an heir of heaven, to have his mind and body polluted, or unfitted for communion with God, by unlawful or inexpedient gratifications, or even by improper thoughts and desires. Yet, in many cases this will not be avoided, without very strict watchfulness, and fervent, persevering prayer, without diligence in every means of grace, and a constant care to shun all temptations or occasions of evil. It is equally inconsistent with the character of a Christian, to "go beyond or defraud his brother in any matter," or to injure him in his property, reputation, or connexions. This too calls for the most diligent care, and the most impartial scrutiny into every part of our conduct: for self-love, and the customs of the world, and even former habits, will otherwise lead us, without reflection, in some measure, to violate the golden rule of "doing to others, as we would they should do unto us." If a believer be led to commit offences of this kind, the Lord will surely chastise him, and thus bring him to repent and forsake them: but if any cloke allowed dishonesty, with specious appearances of piety, or zeal for certain doctrines however true, they will dreadfully find, that "the Lord is the Avenger of all such;" and their present impunity will only tend to their heavier condemnation at last. (Note, Matt. 23:14.) Of this the great champion for the doctrines of grace "forewarned" his new converts, his beloved Thessalonians; testifying that nothing could induce the Lord to connive at the want of strict honesty, in the dealings of men with each other. For the Lord has not called us into a state of peace with him, that we may go on in the polluting practice of worldly lusts; but that, depending on his promises, "we may cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.) And let it be remembered, that he who despises such admonitions, does not so much despise him who enforces them from the pulpit or the press, as that God by whose Spirit they were originally dictated: yea, he as really despises God, as that man does, who contemns the message of salvation by the grace of the gospel. (Note, 1 Sam. 12:9,10.)

V. 9—18.

All true believers are "taught of God to love one another" as brethren in Christ, and from love to his name: (Notes, 1 John 2:7—11. 3:13—15,18—24. 4:7,8. 5:1—3.) they remember the instructions they have received on that subject, which is so congenial to their new nature; by practice they acquire habits of kindness, compassion, forbearance, and forgiveness; they love their brethren, wherever they meet with them; and they feel an expansive benevolence to all mankind: yet, it is very proper to exhort them to "increase" in these things "more and more." It should also be the height of their ambition, to behave quietly and peaceably; avoiding all interference in other men's matters, diligently attending to their own duty; being willing to "labor, working with their own hands" in any honest calling; and to be active in every service, which their station in the church, the family, or the community requires of them. When Christians are thus industrious, and contented in obscure situations; submitting to many difficulties in order to pay every one his due; decently maintaining their families, devising by every means to live within the bounds of their income; having no need to raise contributions, in order to supply deficiencies, occasioned by providence or extravagance; and being ready to spare a little for the relief of their more indigent brethren and neighbors, they will be respectable themselves, and an honor to the profession of the gospel. And should disappointments and afflictions at any time render them incapable of acting according to their plan; they may expect candid allowance and cheerful assistance: as they will have a testimony in every one's conscience, that it is a real and unavoidable necessity.—Christianity does not forbid, grace does not extinguish, our natural affections; but only teaches us to regulate and moderate them. It therefore behoves believers, to mourn with resignation even for such relatives, as they cannot think of without discouragement in respect of their eternal state: but it is peculiarly improper for them to indulge grief and sorrow, "as men without hope, for those who sleep in Jesus;" whose souls are at rest with him, and whose bodies also shall be raised again, to attend the triumph of their once crucified and risen Redeemer. Indeed inconsolable sorrow, in such cases, however admired by the world, is rebellion against the appointment of God, and the offspring of unbelief; grief should no more be indulged and cherished, than our anger or other passions. Our own loss, on such occasions, we must feel and mourn for with submission to the will of God: but the separation will be short, the reunion rapturous, and the subsequent felicity uninterrupted, unalloyed, and eternal. Nor shall such of us, as endure the stroke of death, be eventually less favored and happy than those, who will be "found alive at the coming of the Lord;" that great event, to which we should continually look forward. For when the incarnate Lord of all worlds shall appear, in "his own glory, and in that of the Father, with all his holy angels;" at his summons, attended "with the voice of the arch-angel, and the trump of God," "the dead in Christ shall rise first;" and, being joined by their brethren then living on the earth, "they shall meet their Lord in the air," with unutterable joy, and be for ever with him in the regions of perfect felicity. May we, by realizing faith and hope, continually anticipate that solemn but joyful period; and comfort ourselves and each other with these words of truth and love! (P. O. 1 Cor. 15:41—58.)

CHAP. V.

As the coming of Christ will be sudden, and bring inevitable destruction on the wicked; "the children of light" are especially called on to prepare for it, in vigilance and sobriety, with faith and love and hope, and to comfort and edify one another, 1—11. Various exhortations, admonitions, and encouragements, 12—25. Concluding prayers and salutations, 26—28.

BUT of <sup>a</sup>the times and the seasons, brethren, <sup>b</sup>ye have no need that I write unto you.

<sup>a</sup> Matt. 24:3,36. Mark 13:30—1 b 4:9. 2 Cor. 9:1. Jude 3. 32. Acts 1:7.

2 For yourselves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord so cometh, as a thief in the night.

3 For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.

Note.—The apostle did not think it needful, to write to the Thessalonians concerning the precise time of Christ's coming; or the seasons appointed by God, for the accomplishment of his promises and predictions. This was not a matter of revelation, and it did not belong to him, or them, to inquire into it, from an un-availing, presumptuous curiosity. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. 25:1—13. Mark 13:32—37. Acts 1:4—8, v. 7.) In general, they "perfectly knew," from his former instructions, that "the day of the Lord was coming as a thief in the night." (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, Matt. 24:42—44. 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 16:12—16.) The thief breaks into the house, while the family is asleep, and un-prepared for resistance; and thus excites great terror, and plunders or murders as he pleases: thus the day of the Lord is coming on the ignorant, the careless, the secure, and unbelieving, when they do not expect it; it will excite the most distressing consternation, and will plunge them into the most tremendous destruction.—As the hour of death is the same to each person, which judgment will be to mankind in general; so the same remarks and illustrations equally answer to both cases: and when sinners are flattering themselves with the hope of "peace and safety," then sudden destruction will come upon them. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Note, Luke 12:15—21, v. 20. 21:34—36.) This is further illustrated by another most striking similitude: as the woman with child, often when she is thinking of something else, is suddenly seized with her travailing pangs, which unavoidably increase upon her; so ungodly men have abundant reason to look forward with terror to death and judgment: yet, they are employed and amused by so many other matters, that they are suddenly surprised with those solemn events, when they least expect them; and this first astonishment will be followed with increasing misery, from which it will be impossible for them ever to escape. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, Ps. 48:4—7. Is. 21:3—5. Dan. 5:5—9, 30, 31. Matt. 22:32—35.) The former chapter ends with a special revelation, concerning the Lord's coming to judgment; and the beginning of this ought certainly to be interpreted of the same grand events.

4 But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief.

5 Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

6 Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober.

7 For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night.

8 But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breast-plate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation:

9 For God hath not appointed us to wrath; but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ,

10 Who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

11 Wherefore, comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle judged it needful to give these warnings, for the benefit of those who were negligent in preparing for "the coming of the Lord:" yet, he was well satisfied as to the Christians at Thessalonica in general. They not only enjoyed the outward light of the gospel, and professed to believe and walk in it; but he was persuaded, that they were really "delivered from the power of darkness," and the ignorance and wickedness of their heathen state. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Acts 26:16—18. Col. 1:9—14.) They were not, therefore, in danger of being overtaken by the day of the Lord, when unprepared; as the thief surprises those that are asleep. They were all, according to their profession, nay, according to his confidence in them, "the children of light, and of the day;" (Notes, John 8:12. 12:34—36.

Eph. 5:8—14.) for none of Christ's true disciples were "of the night, or of darkness." They neither continued in ignorance or under delusion, nor lived in wickedness, nor wanted concealment for their secret practices: but, being delivered from the thick darkness of heathenism, or the comparative darkness of Judaism, they enjoyed and walked according to the clear light of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, Is. 60:1—3. 1 John 1:5—7. 2:7—11.) It behoved them, therefore, to act up to their privileges; and not to be supine, indolent, careless, and unwatchful, as others were, or as "the rest of mankind" were: but to be vigilant, circumspect, upon their guard against the assaults and stratagems of their enemies, and attentive to every opportunity of duty; and to be serious, considerate, moderate in every thing of a secular nature, and indifferent as to all animal indulgences. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, 1 Pet. 2:9—12. 4:1—5,7. P. O. 1—11. 5:8,9.) In general, men choose to sleep during the quiet of the night; and to be drunken or riotous, when others were asleep, that their excess might be the less noticed. In like manner, all sloth, unwatchfulness, intemperance, or excessive worldly pursuits, were more consistent with the condition of benighted heathens, than with that of Christians; who would, as it were, turn the day into night, if they were betrayed into such practices. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Note, Rom. 13:11—14.) As therefore they enjoyed the full light of "the Sun of righteousness," they ought to "be sober and vigilant;" for they had not only a great work to do; but an arduous warfare to maintain, against numerous, potent, active, and subtle enemies. (Notes, Eph. 6:10—20.) They ought to stand armed like soldiers, and to be vigilant as sentinels: while faith in Christ, and a firm belief of the divine word, with reliance on the promises, and love to God, to Christ Jesus, to holiness, to each other, and to all men, constituted "a breast-plate," to defend their heart and mind from mortal wounds; and a well-grounded, realizing "hope" of eternal happiness and complete salvation, was like "a helmet" to cover their heads in the day of battle, to defend them from the fear of the most cruel persecutors. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Heb. 6:11—20, v. 19. 1 Pet. 1:3—5,13—16. 1 John 1:1—4.) This hope they were warranted to entertain; as their conversion proved, that "God had not appointed them to" endure the severity of his "wrath," which their sins had deserved; but had "chosen them to obtain salvation" of his free mercy, through Jesus Christ; who had willingly suffered death to atone for their sins, and to ransom their souls; that "whether they waked or slept," whether they lived or died, or in whatever circumstances they were found at death, or at the coming of their Lord, they might live together with him in glory. (Marg. Ref. u—z.—1:1—4. Rom.

5:3—10. 8:23—31. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) They ought therefore to comfort themselves, and each other when they met together, by mutual exhortations and encouragements; while every individual endeavored to animate his brethren, and especially his most intimate friend and companion; and thus to instruct and edify one another in faith and holiness, as they had already begun to do. Note.—It is evident that the apostle, either personally, or by Timothy, Titus, and others of his fellow-laborers, used to "ordain elders in every city:" (Notes, Acts 14:21—23. 20:17—28. 1 Tim. 5:21,22. 2 Tim. 2:1,2. Tit. 1:5—9.) and, though no mention is made of this, either in the brief history of his labors at Thessalonica, or in the opening of the epistle; there can be no reasonable doubt, that he had appointed elders over the church in that city also. It was their office to "labor" among the people, in preaching the word of God, and in every means of promoting their edification, and the conversion of sinners: to preside in the regulation and conduct of public worship, and in the management of their spiritual concerns; as placed over them in the Lord, to act by his authority and in his name: and to admonish, reprove, and warn such persons as acted wrong, or were likely to be drawn aside. The apostle therefore exhorted the people to be observant of these teachers and rulers, to acknowledge them as the Lord's stewards, and to regard their admonitions: and they were directed not only to love them as Christians, but to "esteem them more abundantly in love for their work's sake;" and to show them all respect and kindness, in return for the benefit which they derived from their faithful labors; that, under their guidance and instruction, they might live in entire harmony with each other. (Marg. Ref. d-i.)—The apostle on the other hand exhorted the pastors, and others in conjunction with them, to warn, reprove, and censure such persons as were unruly, and acted like soldiers who quit their ranks; to comfort those who were weak in the faith, timorous, discouraged through temptation, and harassed by perplexities, fears, and misapprehensions; to support, by proper instructions and every encouraging topic, such as were ready to stumble, or were of a weak and feeble capacity; as well as to support and provide for those who were sick, and unable to maintain themselves. (Marg. Ref. k-o.—Notes, Is. 35:3,4. 40:1,2. Matt. 12: 14—21. Acts 20:32—35, v. 35.) At the same time, it was incumbent on them, to exercise patience and long-suffering towards persons of all kinds; behaving with tenderness and meekness even to those who acted in the most ungrateful or perverse manner. Indeed all of them ought to be extremely watchful, lest injuries and insults should induce them to "render evil for evil." Let them see to it, that on no account whatever, they did this "to any man," however inexcusable his conduct might be; on the contrary they ought steadily to persevere in all those things, which were kind, benevolent, beneficent, and useful, "both among themselves and towards all men," without excepting even their virulent persecutors. (Marg. Ref. p-t.—Notes, Prov. 24:17,18,29. 25:21,22. Rom. 12:14—21. 1 Pet. 3:8—12.) This may also imply an instruction to the pastors and other Christians, to watch over their brethren; and if they perceived any indications of a bitter and vindictive spirit, to repress it by every suitable means, and with all their influence.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle exhorted the Christians at Thessalonica to consider it as their duty, as well as privilege, to be "always rejoicing" in the Lord. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, Hab. 3:17—19. Rom. 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3. 4:4.) He also directed them to pray incessantly, at stated seasons, occasionally, and with frequent ejaculations; and to watch against every thing, which could put them out of frame for this important privilege and duty: (Marg. Ref. x.—Notes, Luke 13: 1—8. Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.) to "give thanks" also in every thing, and in all circumstances, as all their mercies were unmerited, and all their trials would prove beneficial: so that this constant spirit of gratitude was "the will of God concerning them," as his children in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, Phil. 4:5,6. Col. 3:16,17. Heb. 13:15,16. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.)—Many have explained "quenching the Spirit," of restraining the exercise of spiritual gifts, in themselves or others: but doubtless it relates principally to the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit, in the hearts of believers; not excluding his strivings and convictions in the hearts and consciences of sinners. These sacred influences tend to kindle a flame of sacred love in the soul: but they may be quenched, by evil tempers, by procrastination, by worldly cares, by inexpedient indulgences, by trifling company, or by negligence; even as fire may be quenched with water, and will go out if it be not supplied with fuel, if it want air, or be choked with ashes. Thus convictions are often finally extinguished, and the Holy Spirit will "no more strive with men;" (Note, Gen. 6:3.) and thus believers often greatly damp the holy ardor of their souls, mar their own comfort, and impede their growth in grace; by not giving themselves up without delay to those spiritual affections, which are excited by the Holy Spirit, and by "quenching" them in the manner before-mentioned: and this is the direct opposite to "quenching the fiery darts of the wicked one." (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Eph. 4:30—32. 6:14—17.)—The apostle also warned his brethren, "not to despise prophesyings:" or those instructions, and intimations of the divine will, which were given them by the prophets, either in explaining the scriptures, or from immediate suggestions of the Spirit. c.—Notes, 1 Cor. 14:.) The exhortation may also fairly include the more ordinary preaching of God's word.—Yet, as there would be many false teachers, and erroneous doctrines propagated by them; they must be careful to "prove," or try, both the teachers and their instructions, by the word of God; that they might reject what was spurious, and adhere to what was good and excellent. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Is. 8:20. 1 John 4:1—3.) And, not only were they exhorted to abstain from evident evil; but from every thing which appeared to be sinful, either in their own judgment, or in that of others; and to do nothing, concerning the lawfulness of which they doubted; or which might appear suspicious to those around them, and so prejudice them against the truth. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Rom. 14:19—23. 2 Cor. 8:16—24, v. 21.)—No doubt, cases often arise, in which we are required to do those things, that appear evil to misinformed, prejudiced, and unreasonable men; in order to obey the commands of God, and to follow the clear dictates of our own consciences. But these are exceptions to the general rule, which could not be particularized in so compendious an exhortation; and they seem to be the only exceptions. For it is better to avoid what appears evil to others, though lawful in itself, if it can be done with a safe conscience; than by an uncharitable exercise of our Christian liberty, to cause our weak brother to offend, or to prejudice others against the gospel. (Notes, Rom. 12:17—21. 14:13—18. 15:1—3. 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 10:23—33.)—The Spirit. (19) 'That is, the affluence, and light of God shining into our minds. 'But, some one will say, if that be never extinguished in the elect, this is commanded in vain. This, however, I strenuously deny. 'Nay, for this reason it is not extinguished in the elect, because they cherish it; and they are induced by these exhortations to cherish it. For he, who hath determined never wholly to extinguish his Spirit in the elect, hath also made known by what means he will cherish it, namely, by the progress of his people in piety.' Beza.—Prove, &c. (21) 'The apostle does not here bid the guides of the church try all things, and the people hold fast that which they delivered to them; but gives an injunction common to all Christians, having "their senses exercised to discern good and evil;" to all, who are obliged "to hold fast that which is good," and not to believe false prophets: "which is a strong argument for the perspicuity and sufficiency of holy scripture for this work, and against the necessity of a living judge. 'For he that must "try all things," must also "try the doctrine of this living judge, and therefore till he hath made this trial, must not admit his doctrine as an article of Christian faith. For these words plainly teach, that what we must hold fast, must first be tried. 'Hearers, says St. Basil, who are instructed in the scriptures, ought to try the things spoken

'by their teachers; ... and receive those doctrines which are consonant, and reject those things which are alien from the holy scriptures.' Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. 15:10, 11. Luke 12:54—57. Acts 17:10—15.)

Note.—The apostle subjoined to his exhortations, fervent prayers to God; knowing that his efficacious grace alone could produce "the will and power;" to do all the things to which he exhorted them. He besought the "very God of peace," "as in Christ reconciling the world unto himself;" and as actually reconciled to believers, and the Author of all their inward and outward peace; that he would sanctify them wholly and in respect of their entire nature; as consisting of a rational and immortal soul, an animal life with its various sensitive appetites, and a material body: that every sense, member, organ, and faculty, might be completely purified, and devoted to the service of God; and that thus they might be preserved blameless till the coming of Christ. (Marg. Ref. g.—i.—Note, 3:11—13.)—He was confident that the church at Thessalonica consisted in general of true believers: and, as he was assured of the Lord's faithfulness to his promises, and covenant-engagements to his people, whom he had called by his grace; so he was satisfied that he would fully grant his prayer for them. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 10:13—17. Phil. 1:3—8.)—Having therefore desired them also to pray for him, and solemnly charged them by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let this epistle be read to all the holy brethren, the saints that formed their church; he concluded with his usual salutations and benedictions. 19:20,21.—Charge you, &c. (27) It seems evident, that this was addressed to the pastors of the church, and not to believers in general: else the persons charged, and they for whose benefit the charge was given, would have been precisely the same.—The original is “I adjure you.”—The solemn charge implies likewise a most decided claim to divine inspiration: for it evidently places this, and consequently the apostle’s other epistles, on the footing of the ancient scriptures, “the oracles of God.” (Note, Col. 4:15,16.) It likewise shows, both that oaths and adjurations are in some cases lawful; and that the subject, concerning which the apostle wrote, was considered by him, as peculiarly important. This is worthy of the most serious consideration of all those, even among protestants, who do not make the reading of the scriptures a part of the service, when they meet in the worship of God; and of those who read them in so careless and indistinct a manner, that the congregation cannot hear or understand them. The advantage to illiterate people, to the multitude who cannot read, or who can read but imperfectly, of an audible, distinct, and emphatical reading of the scriptures in public, can scarcely be calculated. It will soon render even the best preaching more fully understood; and it will in some degree supply the deficiency, in other cases.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Curious inquiries about “times and seasons,” are commonly unprofitable and vain. “Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation:” the present time we ought to redeem, the present season of obtaining peace with God by faith in Christ, and of doing his will, we ought to embrace: and then we shall be safe and happy at all events. But, if we regard the scripture, “we know perfectly, that the day of the Lord cometh, as a thief in the night;” and that when sinners are, presumptuously or carelessly, “saying peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, which they shall not escape.” No man is sure, that death and judgment will not thus surprise him; unless he continually expect and prepare for those approaching events. “Numbers at this very hour, are speaking peace and safety to themselves, over whose heads instantaneous destruction is hovering.” Doddridge. And how dreadful will be the astonishment and consternation of the scornful infidel, the careless profligate, the proud Pharisee, or the hardened hypocrite, when sudden destruction shall thus seize upon him, and no possible method of escape can be found! As yet we are in the land of light, of hope, of prayer, of forgiveness; though we might justly long before this have “cast into outer darkness.” Nor are we enveloped with Pagan, Mohammedan, or Antichristian darkness and delusion: we have the light of the gospel, and the holy scriptures afforded us; and we have been led to pay some attention to them. If then we be yet so in darkness, “that the day of the Lord would overtake us as a thief;” our guilt must be peculiarly aggravated. Let us therefore seriously inquire, whether we really be “the children of the light and of the day;” by divine illumination, and by an obedient faith. Let us seek to render this evident, as well as to act consistently with our profession, by “casting off the works of darkness;” and shaking off indolence and carelessness; that we “may not sleep as others do, but may watch and be sober.” Let us leave sloth, self-indulgence, ungodliness, and worldly lusts, to “the children of the night and of darkness:” but let us, who profess “to be of the day, be sober,” vigilant, circumspect, and armed with “the breast-plate of faith and love,” and with “hope as the helmet of salvation.” Thus our evidence will continually increase, that “God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by the Lord Jesus;” and that “whether we wake or sleep, we shall surely “live together with him.” (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8.) And when we remember, that he purchased our deliverance from the wrath to come, by dying on the cross as a sacrifice for our sins; we shall not only be directed how to “comfort ourselves together,” and to edify one another in “our most holy faith;” but we shall feel the constraining power of admiring, adoring, grateful love; and learn how to live to him, with whom we hope to live for ever in glory.

The office of a minister calls a man to “labor” for the salvation of souls with unwearied assiduity, as well as to “preside over them in the Lord:” nor ought the spiritual authority ever to be separated from the “laboring in the word and doctrine:” though alas, it very generally is!—Faithful pastors should be carefully distinguished from slothful, ambitious, or mercenary men, who have the name and garb of ministers: they should be owned and attended to, and their admonitions valued and obeyed; and they ought to be “esteemed very highly in love,” not because of the name and office which they bear, but “for their work’s sake,” and in proportion to their skill, faithfulness, and diligence in it. They, therefore, are highly culpable, who despise the admonitions, reject the authority, and refuse respect and affection to the persons, of faithful ministers: but such as expect the reputation, esteem, authority, or emolument, of the ministry, without a diligent attention to its various and laborious duties, are even still more criminal. Outward respect may indeed be paid them: but it is impossible for intelligent Christians “to esteem them very highly in love for their work’s sake:” though they will compassionately mourn over and pray for them.—Our love of “peace among ourselves,” should not induce us to connive at sin: but we must, according to our several relations in the church, in domestic life, or in society, “warn,” reprove, and censure “the unruly,” as well as tenderly soothe and “comfort the feeble-minded, and support the weak” in body or soul.

We should also learn "patience towards all men," especially towards persons of weak capacities, or little faith; who are often very wearying with their complaints, scruples, doubts, mistakes, and infirmities; and yet give no reason to suspect their sincerity, but rather call for compassion; being harassed with sore temptations, which perhaps have an effect, for the time, upon their tempers. (Note, Gal. 6: 1—5.) Even when we are injured in the most atrocious manner, we must "see to it, that" we on no account "render evil for evil to any man;" but must learn "to follow," with persevering constancy, "that which is good" and friendly, "both among ourselves and to all men;" as knowing what patience and mercy we have experienced and still continually need from God.—His glory is concerned in our "always rejoicing;" this will be greatly promoted, if we "pray without ceasing;" and in "every thing give thanks, according to the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us." To make progress in this life of communion with God, we must be careful not "to quench the Spirit;" by refusing compliance with his holy suggestions, or postponing the good works to which his influences tend to excite us. (Ec. 9:10.) We should also learn to pay a reverent attention to every message, delivered to us by his ministers; and thus we shall "grow in grace," and abound in consolation. Yet, as "Satan's ministers are transformed into the ministers of righteousness;" while we "despise not prophecies," we must learn to prove and assay men and doctrines; that we may distinguish between truth and specious error, and so choose and cleave to that which is good and right; and that for the honor of the gospel, we may "abstain from all appearance of evil;" "providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men;" and taking heed, "that our good be not evil spoken of." (P. O. Rom. 12:9—16. 2 Cor. 8:16—24.)

The exhortations above given, show us what we ought to be and to do: but we must remember, that our hearts are naturally opposite to them; nor can any inward and abiding change be wrought in us, save by a divine power. As therefore ministers should pray for their people, as well as exhort them; every individual should turn the precepts and promises of God into prayers, for himself and his brethren: and, while he uses every other means of grace, and vigilantly shuns all hindrances and temptation; he should still beseech "the God of peace himself, to sanctify him wholly, and that his spirit, and soul, and body, may be preserved blameless, until the coming of our Lord Jesus." If these be our earnest desires, fervent prayers, and diligent endeavors; the promises and covenant of our God, his power and love, and his immutable faithfulness authorize our fullest assurance, that, having called us by his grace, he will keep us by the same, unto complete and everlasting salvation, whatever immense inward or outward difficulties may seem to render it impracticable.—The most eminent servants of Christ want and value the prayers of their weakest brethren.—Let us be thankful that these excellent epistles are reserved for our perusal also: and while we remember, that the apostle "charged" the Thessalonians, by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let them be read to all the holy brethren, some of whom might not be able to read them for themselves; we may be sure that an Antichrist alone would forbid the laity to read the scriptures, lest they should lead them into heresy. What then shall we think of those protestants, even pastors and rulers, who oppose the circulation of the scriptures, without note or comment, as greatly endangering either the church or the state, or both? We shall also hence learn the propriety of reading them in our public congregations; and we shall be stirred up to study them with more humble diligence and obedient faith; that thus "the grace of the Lord Jesus may be with us" also. (Note, 2 Cor. 13:11—14.)

THIS Epistle is commonly supposed to have been written from Corinth, not very long after the foregoing, because Silvanus and Timothy still continued with Paul; but the evidence is not very conclusive, and some difficulties attend this opinion. (Note, 1:3,4.) It is, however, certain that it was not sent from Athens, according to the spurious postscript.—The main object of the epistle seems to have been, to prevent mistakes, which the Christians at Thessalonica were about to fall into, concerning the near approach of the day of judgment; grounded in part on a misconception of some expressions in his former epistle, and of what the apostle had spoken when with them; but supported also by some person or persons making a claim to inspiration, and, as some think, by a forged epistle. As this opinion was of a very injurious tendency, the apostle strenuously opposed it. (Notes, 2:1—4.)—He had also heard of some individuals, who on religious pretences neglected their secular employments, and walked disorderly; whom he exhorted his brethren to censure and shun, yet so as to seek their good. Amidst a number of instructive warnings, exhortations, and encouragements, it contains a most remarkable prophecy; (Notes, 2:3—12.) the exact fulfilment of which is a full demonstration of the divine inspiration, by which the apostle wrote his epistles.—‘Besides the general marks of its genuineness, and divine authority, which it bears in common with the rest of the epistles; it has one peculiar to itself, from the exact representation it contains of the ‘papal power, under the characters of “the man of sin,” and “the mystery of iniquity.” For, considering how directly opposite the principles here described were to the genius of Christianity, it must appear, at the time when this epistle was written, highly improbable to all human apprehension, that they should ever prevail in the Christian church: and consequently a prediction like this, which answers in every particular so exactly to the event, must be allowed to carry its own evidence with it, and to prove that the author of it wrote under a ‘divine influence.’ Doddridge.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the Church of the Thessalonians, 1, 2; thanks God for their growth in faith and love, encourages their perseverance under persecutions, by the prospect of the coming of Christ; and shows how glorious he will then appear in the destruction of all unbelievers, and the complete salvation of his people, 3—10. He prays for their perfect sanctification, and meetness for heavenly felicity, by the grace, and for the glory, of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, 11, 12.

PAUL, <sup>a</sup> and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ:

2 Grace <sup>b</sup> unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Note.—Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 2 Cor. 1:17—20. 1 Thes. 1:1—4. 1 Pet. 1:1, 2. Rev. 1:4—6.

3 We <sup>c</sup> are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, <sup>d</sup> as it is meet, because that <sup>e</sup> your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth;

4 So that we ourselves <sup>f</sup> glory in you, in the churches of God, for <sup>g</sup> your patience and faith, in all <sup>h</sup> your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

Note.—The apostle, since he wrote the foregoing epistle, had received further accounts concerning the church at Thessalonica, which were so fully satisfactory, that he deemed himself bound, to return continual thanks to God in their behalf. (Notes, 1 Thes. 1:1—8.) This was “meet” and right; seeing that, in answer to his prayers, and by means of his epistolary exhortations, they became more fully acquainted with divine truth, and grew stronger in faith, by an exceedingly rapid progress: and the “love of every one of them towards all the rest, “abounded” in all its manifold exercises and beneficial effects: so that he rejoiced and gloried in them in the churches of God, showing them what flourishing Christians the Thessalonians were, and what a blessed seal God had given to his ministry in their conversion. (Marg. Ref.)—This may induce a doubt whether the epistle were written from Corinth or not: for, on that supposition, Paul had visited no other churches since he wrote the former epistle, except such as had been planted in that vicinity; and we can hardly suppose, that he only referred to what Timothy or Silvanus had said of them; if indeed they had left him for a season to visit other churches, and then returned. (Preface to 1 Thes.) However, he and his fellow-laborers gloried in the Thessalonians; because they endured various persecutions and heavy afflictions with exemplary patience and constant faith. We are not informed of the particulars relative to these persecutions; but they seem to have exposed them to very great hardships and dangers. (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:1—5. 1 Thes. 3:1—5.)

obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

10 When he shall come <sup>z</sup> to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because <sup>a</sup> our testimony among you was believed,) <sup>b</sup> in that day.

Note.—The patience of the Christians at Thessalonica, while suffering in the cause of Christ, and for “conscience sake,” was “a manifest token,” or demonstration, “of the righteous judgment of God:” it fully proved, that he would “judge the world in righteousness,” and rectify all the apparent disorders of the present scene: seeing he left his blameless and zealous worshippers to endure persecutions and tribulations, and his enemies to prosper in their impious and iniquitous opposition against his cause and people. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Note, 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) Indeed, he permitted his servants to be afflicted, in order to prove and manifest their faith and grace, and to increase in them all holy dispositions and affections; that they might at length be “counted worthy,” or proper persons, to inherit that kingdom of heavenly glory, “which God hath prepared for them that love him;” in hope of which felicity they so patiently suffered, as well as from love to ‘his kingdom of grace,’ established upon earth, and in order to promote its prosperity and enlargement. For by these means it would be manifestly shown, to be perfectly just and “righteous” in God “to recompense tribulation” and anguish to those, who troubled his harmless and holy friends and worshippers, by their cruel enmity and persecution, because of their relation and conformity to him; as they would thus evidently be proved to be his inveterate enemies. On the other hand, it would appear honorable to his justice, as well as his mercy, to bestow “rest” and felicity in heaven on those, who willingly endured tribulation in his cause, for his sake, from his enemies, and according to his will: and indeed having given promises to this effect, his equity required the fulfilment of them. (Marg. Ref. l—o.—Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. Luke 6:21—26.)—This righteous judgment of God will be executed, when “the Lord Jesus shall be revealed,” as visibly descending from heaven, attended by “the angels of his power;” his creatures, worshippers, and servants, who shall then act as the ministers of his authority, in showing mercy and executing vengeance. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 16:24—28. 24:29—31. 25:31—33. Jude 14—16.) Then he will appear “in flaming fire,” to burn up this visible creation, and this will be an emblem of his awful avenging justice. (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:5—9.) For he will take vengeance, not only on idolatrous Gentiles, persecuting Jews, and men of scandalous and abandoned characters, but on all those, who continue strangers and enemies to the true God, and his holy worship and service; on all who have not so known him, as to fear, love, trust, and serve him; and on all, “who obey not the gospel of the Lord Jesus,” by receiving him, relying on him, and submitting to him, as their Saviour and King. (Marg. Ref. q—t.—Notes, Matt. 25:34—46. Rom. 2:4—16. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. Rev. 20:11—15.) All these, however numerous, or distinguished by rank, accomplishments, or splendid actions, “will be punished with eternal destruction,” being banished as accursed, “from the presence of the Lord,” in which alone felicity can be found; and finding his avenging frown, like lightning, to appal and torture their inmost souls, and “the glory of his power” irresistibly forcing them, with dreadful consternation, into the place of torment. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) This will be accomplished, when Jesus shall appear with divine majesty in human nature, to “be glorified by his saints:” as the riches of his love, the preciousness of his redemption, the efficacy of his grace, the power of his arm, and his faithfulness to his promises, will be most gloriously displayed in their complete salvation. And not only will he then be admired by those that now believe in him, who will then find their largest expectations far exceeded, and who will not think it possible sufficiently to adore and praise such a glorious Benefactor; but he will be admired in them likewise, by all the inhabitants of heaven, who will celebrate the wonders wrought by him, in thus saving and exalting such mean, guilty, and polluted rebels and enemies, and the astonishing change effected in their character and condition. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, Num. 23:23. Ps. 126:1—3.) This the apostle was confident would be the case of the Christians at Thessalonica, because his “testimony” concerning Christ had been credited by them, and their faith had been manifested by its genuine effects. Note.—In the prospect of the decisive season above mentioned, the apostle and his fellow-labors prayed continually for their brethren at Thessalonica, that the Lord would vouchsafe them whatever was wanting to make them “meet” for this felicity, to which the gospel called them; that he would adjudge them to be entitled to it, “according to the grace” of the new Covenant in Christ; and that he would “accomplish the work” of complete sanctification, and prepare them for that glory, to which the sovereign good pleasure of his goodness and love had appointed them, and which he had great complacency and delight in conferring on them; (Note, Luke 12:22—34, v. 32.) that so he would finish the work by his almighty power, which he was carrying on in their souls, through faith, till at length it should be perfected in vision and enjoyment. (Marg. Ref. c—i.) This they prayed for, in order that “the name of Christ might be glorified in them,” both by their present bold profession of his truth, and their holy conduct, and zealous labors to spread the gospel; and, at length, in the sight of the whole world to all eternity: and that they might also “be glorified in Christ,” by perfectly bearing his image, enjoying his love, being owned as his brethren, and sharing all his honor, according to the infinite riches of the mercy and grace of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who have already distinguished themselves by “the work of faith, and the labor of love, and the patience of hope,” are yet capable of “growing exceedingly” in all these things: for the highest attainments of saints on earth fall far beneath full perfection. (Note, Phil. 3:12—14.) When Christians thus “grow in grace,” and abound in all the exercises of mutual love; the hearts of faithful and zealous ministers greatly rejoice: and they will feel themselves “bound to give thanks to God always for them, as it is meet;” and to speak of them “in the churches of God,” to excite their thanksgivings also, and to animate them to a holy emulation.—The patient sufferings of exemplary Christians, and the prosperity of ungodly men and cruel persecutors, fully demonstrate a future judgment; when all shall “discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not.” (Note, Mal. 3:13—18, v. 18.) This assists us in explaining those mysteries of Providence, which would otherwise greatly perplex us: and we perceive that the devoted worshippers and beloved children of God are proved and purified in the fiery furnace of tribulation, “that they may be accounted worthy of that kingdom for which they suffer;” and that wicked men are permitted to prosper, that their rancorous enmity against God may be manifested, and the measure of their crimes filled up; and that all may see the glory of that justice, which consigns them to the punishment intended for them. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) It must indeed at length appear evident to all rational creatures, that, “it is righteous in God to recompense tribulation to those who trouble” his people, from hatred to his holy truth and service; and that it is honorable to all his perfections to give “rest” and felicity to those, who have been troubled for his sake, and for their love to his cause and worship. Faith, anticipating the grand decisive day, is enabled by the light of revelation to read, and, in a measure, to understand the book of Providence; and thus to wait with composure and comfort for the coming of the Lord. That will be indeed “the day of wrath and of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God:” then the Saviour, once “a Man of sorrows,” and generally despised, rejected, and disobeyed, will “be revealed, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance,” not only on cruel oppressors, persecutors and murderers, or on scandalous profligates and depredators, but “on all, who knew not God, and obeyed not the gospel of his Son;” whether infidels, Pharisees, scoffers, hypocrites, enthusiasts, or Antinomians, or however they might otherwise be denominated or distinguished. All these “shall be punished with an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord.” The majesty of that countenance, which was once defiled with blood and spitting; and the glory of his power, who was once crucified in apparent weakness, shall be intolerable to all the multitudes of the wicked; and they will be wholly incapable of making the least resistance, when with tremendous frown he shall say to them, “Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!” But, at that awful season, he will come especially “to be glorified in his saints,” who have here believed the testimony of God by his apostles concerning him, and thus learned to trust, love, obey, and rejoice in him whom they have not yet seen: and to know and worship God the Father in and through him. (Notes, John 20:24—29, vv. 28, 29. 1 Pet. 1:8,9.) No words can possibly express the admiring and adoring gratitude and love, which will unite with the exulting joy and triumph of that happy period. All hopes and imaginations must fall immensely beneath those unutterable glories, and the holy afflictions with which they will be contemplated and adored. But every believer will then reflect, display, and increase the manifested glory of the divine Saviour, and enhance the praises of all the inhabitants of heaven, "to the Lamb that was slain, and hath redeemed them to God with his blood." May we then "pray always," for ourselves and each other, that "our God may count us worthy of this calling, and fulfil in us all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power; that so the name of our Lord Jesus may be" finally "glorified in us," and our salvation; "and that we may be glorified in and with him, according to the grace of our God, and the Lord Jesus Christ." May we diligently seek to obtain and possess the full assurance, that this shall be our felicity, when "the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God;" and may we now do all in our power to promote and recommend the gospel, and to do good to our fellow-sinners and fellow-Christians. For thus glorifying him on earth, we may be sure of being for ever glorified with him in heaven!

CHAP. II.

The apostle warns the Thessalonians, against groundlessly supposing that the day of Christ was at hand, 1, 2, and shows that it must be preceded by a great apostasy; in which "the man of sin," by his blasphemies, usurpations, and impostures, would cause the destruction of numbers, and then sink himself into perdition, 3-12. He thanks God for his special and effectual grace shown in choosing and calling the Christians at Thessalonica, "unto salvation and glory," 13, 14. He exhorts them to steadfastness, 15; and prays that they may be "comforted, and established in every good word and work," 16, 17.

Note.—Having encouraged the faith, hope, and patience of the persecuted Thessalonians, by the prospect of Christ's coming to perfect their salvation; the apostle exhorted them, and even "besought them by the coming of Christ," and as they hoped to be "gathered together unto him" in glory; not to allow themselves to be easily deluded into the opinion, "that the day of Christ was at hand;" whether that opinion were propagated, by men professing to speak by the Spirit of God; or whether it were grounded on something which he had spoken among them, or on a misconstruction of some expressions in his former epistle. (Marg. Ref. a-f.—Note, 1 Thes. 4:13-18.) For such an erroneous expectation would disquiet their minds, and create in them needless troubles and perplexities: and when they found themselves disappointed in it, they might be tempted to question the truth of the gospel itself. It would at least take them off from the duties of their several callings in society; and their conduct, expectations, and disappointment might eventually render them the derision of their unbelieving neighbors. Several learned men would explain this, of our Lord's coming, in Providence, to destroy Jerusalem, and terminate the persecutions excited by the Jews: but that coming was very near; and the apostle earnestly warned his readers against supposing, that the coming of which he spake was at hand. If, however, this had not been the case, what could there be, in the near approach of divine judgments on Judea, to excite any extraordinary commotion, among the converts at Thessalonica, in Macedonia, nearly a thousand miles distant from Judea; and these chiefly from the Gentiles.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle again most earnestly exhorted them, to "let no man deceive them, by any" artful device or pretence whatever, into so injurious an expectation: and it is evident that this caution was not unnecessary; for notwithstanding it, many of the early Christians expected the day of judgment speedily to come, which betrayed them into various practical mistakes. But Paul, by the Spirit of prophecy, assured them, that Christ would not come to judgment, till "a falling away," or the apostasy, of a great body of professed Christians from the true gospel of Christ had previously taken place. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Doubtless many apostacies occurred, in the primitive ages, under different heresiarchs: but, all the circumstances of this prediction were never verified, except in that departure from the faith, and that usurpation and spiritual tyranny connected with it, which took place by means of the church of Rome: and the manifest absurdity of all other interpretations, as clearly shown in the controversies of those who contend for one or another of them against their opponents, abundantly prove this. No apostacy of equal magnitude and duration, no delusions equally pernicious and abominable, have taken place, since the apostle's days. The imposture of Mohammed alone can be at all compared with it, and this could not be here intended. for that impostor and his successors were not placed "in the temple of God," the visible church; (Note, Rev.

11:1,2.) but without it, and in direct opposition to the very name of Christianity; they propagated their delusions mainly by the sword, and not by "lying miracles;" (Note, 8—12.) and indeed the impieties of Mohammed never equalled the blasphemies here predicted.—In connexion with this apostacy, "the man of sin would be revealed." In the language of prophecy, a king generally signifies a succession of monarchs, of the same family or dynasty, carrying on the same design. (Notes, Dan. 7:15—27.) Thus "the man of sin" does not mean a single person, but a succession of men, impious in themselves; and conducting the same wicked design of corrupting Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and practice; establishing an intolerable tyranny on religious pretences; and using all kinds of seduction, iniquity, and cruel persecution, to induce mankind to adopt the anti-christian system. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Rev. 13:3) This "man of sin" would be "the son of perdition;" (John 17:12.) a genuine descendant of Judas, the apostle and the traitor, who sold his Lord for money, and betrayed him with a kiss; a peculiar factor and agent of Satan, in destroying the souls of men; and finally sinking himself into perdition as his inheritance. (Notes, Rev. 17:7—14.) It is manifest, that no succession of men have yet appeared on earth, to whom this description fully accords, except that of the Roman pontiffs, as in succession the visible head of the popish church.—This deceiver would "oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped," either by Christians or Pagans: thus the Roman pontiffs have opposed the truths, commandments, and disciples of Christ, in every age and by every means; they have opposed the prophetic office of Christ, by teaching human inventions; his priestly office, by the doctrine of human merits and created intercessors; and his kingly office, by changing and dispensing with his laws. (Notes, Dan. 11:34—45. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 1 John 2:18,19.)—They have "exalted themselves above all that is called God, and is worshipped," by claiming authority to forgive sins, even in those who manifestly continue impenitent; by granting indulgences to men to break the commandments of God; by dispensing with his laws, and placing their own decrees above them, as if of superior validity; and by presuming to give meaning and authority to the scriptures themselves; which must not be understood in any other sense, than what they impose upon them. (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—Moreover, this "man of sin," "sits as God in the temple of God;" and we must therefore look for him within the visible church: there he blasphemously usurps the throne of God, showing himself to be God. Many Roman emperors affected divine honors and demanded adoration: but there was no antecedent "apostacy" from Christianity or the worship of JEHOVAH; and they might rather be said to sit in the temple of Jupiter or Mars, than in that of God; whose temple must be considered to be among his professed worshippers, and not among avowed heathens. But the Roman pontiff, claiming to be the universal head of the whole church of God; called by his flatterers

'Vice-God,' 'a God upon earth;' arrogating the title of 'his Holiness,' boasting of 'infallibility,' claiming a right to depose kings and bestow kingdoms on whom he pleases; with those impious claims before-mentioned, answers so exactly to the description here given, that we cannot reasonably doubt for whom it was designed. While the Roman pontiff opposes the worship of God, by enjoying the worship of images, and of saints and angels, and the authority of his laws, to enforce subjection to his own edicts; he himself may be called the great idol, as well as the great tyrant, of the Romish church; (Note, Rev. 13:13—17.) as he demands the most abject submission, and prostration from all men, both in body and soul, and pours contempt on all authority human and divine. But particulars cannot here be more fully insisted on. It suffices to show that the Roman pontiffs answered, and still do answer to this description, as the person intended is the archetype of an excellent portrait; and we may venture to assert, that no other succession of men ever did thus accord to it; perhaps no single individual within the visible church.—The apostles, at least after the gospel was preached to the Gentiles, never spoke of the temple at Jerusalem as the temple of God; but the Christian church in general, or believers in particular, are always denoted by that phrase.—The striking coincidence of this extraordinary prediction, with many parts of the prophecy of Daniel, and of the Revelation of St. John, may be seen to advantage, by consulting the marginal references; and, as far as the author's views of them are concerned, by examining the notes on the passages referred to in those prophecies.—Who opposeth, &c. these particulars to his converts, which they ought to have remembered. (Notes, Acts 17:1—9.) When they recollected what he had spoken upon this subject, they would know what "withheld," or retarded, this apostacy for the present; and so prevented its taking place openly and evidently, till the time appointed for it in the purpose of God. The Roman empire, united under one potent government, and extremely jealous of all other power and authority, prevented the establishment of that spiritual tyranny and usurpation, by which Satan was attempting to make his grand effort against Christianity: but it would not have been prudent for the apostle, explicitly to mention it, in an epistle for general perusal; nor would it have accorded to the style of prophecy: however, most of the fathers so far understood him, as to declare that Antichrist would not come, till after the downfall of the Roman empire. Had it not been for this obstacle, the evil would have broken out much sooner: for even when this was written, "the mystery of iniquity did already work." This grand and deep design of Satan, this mysterious system, which was founded in all kind of iniquities, or productive of them, being placed in direct opposition to the "great mystery of godliness," was already operating upon the minds of men. (Marg. Ref. q, s.—Notes, 1 Tim. 3:16. 4:1—5. Rev. 17:3—5.) The ambition and avarice of some, who preached the gospel, and exercised spiritual gifts from corrupt motives; who opposed the apostles, in order to obtain authority, influence, and secular advantage; or who perverted the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, introducing false and selfish confidences, superstitions, will-worship, self-imposed austerities, and the worship of angels; and the disposition of many professed Christians to "follow their pernicious ways," were as a corrupt leaven, which, working secretly, would at length produce this great apostacy. (Notes, Col. 2:18—23. 2 Tim. 2:14—19. 3:1—9. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) But the Roman empire, which then "letted" or hindered its full effect, by keeping the church under persecution, and curbing all authority but its own, would continue to retard this event, until it should be removed out of the way. The conversion of the Roman emperors to Christianity, in the beginning of the fourth century, tended greatly to prepare things for this apostacy, by giving scope to the ambition and avarice of the ecclesiastics, and by multiplying exceedingly merely nominal Christians: but it was not till the subversion of the western empire by the northern nations, and the division of it into ten kingdoms, that way was made for the full establishment of the papal usurpation at Rome, the capital city of the empire. (Notes, Rev. 8:11—14.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The obstacle above-mentioned having been taken out of the way, "that wicked," or lawless one, would be revealed, and would display the deformity of his character without disguise, by endeavoring to exalt himself above all laws human and divine. But though this great usurper would "practise and prosper;" yet the Lord would at length consume him by "the spirit," or the breath, of his mouth. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, Job 4:7—11. Is. 11:2—5. Rev. 19:11—16.) According to the predictions of his word, and by the preaching of his gospel attended by the influences of his Spirit, he would gradually waste and consume this anti-christian tyranny, and terminate all his corruptions of the gospel. This he has been accomplishing, during the space of above three hundred years, since the first dawnings of the Reformation: he will shortly destroy the whole papal authority, and all obstinately attached to it, "by the brightness of his coming" to spread the gospel through the nations; (Notes, Rev. 18:—20:1—6.) and he will finally condemn, and punish with everlasting destruction, all the actors in this grand delusion, when he shall come to judge the world. (Note, Rev. 20:11—15.) Such will certainly be the doom of this "lawless one," this "man of sin," this "son of perdition," whose coming would be attended, and whose success obtained, not by open force, but by the deep subtlety and peculiar "energy of Satan;" with the highest pretences of authority and claims of power; and with every kind of counterfeit signs and wonders, either of deep-laid human imposture, or of satanical operation, by which men would mimic the miracles of Christ and his apostles, as the Egyptian magicians did those of Moses.

It would also be accompanied with all the various kinds of forgery, fraud, and imposture, with which men's senses and understandings have been deluded by artful deceivers, in different ages and nations of the world: and with every hypocritical device, which the ingenuity and sagacity of men or devils could possibly invent, to support the cause of unrighteousness, and delude the world into a stupid admiration, a blind reverence, and an implicit submission, to the arrogant claims and multiplied idolatries and abominations of this grand delusion. (Marg. Ref. a-c.) Thus, by artful stratagems and machinations, multitudes would be fatally deceived, among such as were in the way of perdition. For, seeing they had not "received the love of the truth," but had neglected or perverted the saving doctrine of the gospel, through pride and carnal enmity; they would, for this cause, be left to judicial blindness; (Note, John 3:19-21.) and God would, by means of these men, "send them a strong delusion," which would bind them fast in the chains of error and false confidence; so that they would be fascinated into the firm belief of Satan's lie, and venture their souls upon it. (Marg. Ref. d-i. Notes, 1 Kings 22:19-23. Is. 6:9,10. 44:18-20. Ez. 14:9-11.) Thus, being held in impenitence and unbelief, and under the power of their own lusts, they would be left to manifest their enmity to God, and to fill up the measure of their sins; that they might be condemned at the day of judgment, and receive their merited punishment; even those who had not believed the truth of Christ, but "had pleasure in unrighteousness," and in the delusions of this great apostate and usurper, because it accorded to their pride, love of the world, and dislike to the spiritual worship and service of God: for this seems rather to refer to the deceived, than to the deceivers. It implied, that God would act in this matter, according to the general rule, of giving up those who obstinately hated the truth through love of sin, to be blinded by Satan; and that there would be a remnant, even under the deepest darkness of this impostor's reign, of another character and description.—Nothing can more exactly coincide with the system of popery, as it prevailed in the Roman church, and under the Roman pontiff for many ages, than this passage does. Even their boasted pretensions to miraculous powers; and the imposture or ambiguity of every instance, is the grand proof of all, that they were marked out by the Holy Spirit. And the adherence of the church of Rome, even to the present day, to the gross worship of images, saints, and angels; and to the doctrine of authoritative absolutions, dispensations, penances, purgatory, transubstantiation, and the merit of good works, proves that "the man of sin," though consuming by the Spirit and the word of Christ, is yet very far from being destroyed "by the brightness of his coming."—It is very wonderful, that any reflecting persons should ever think this prophecy applicable to the antichristian delusions of modern infidels or atheists, who have apostatized from a profession of Christianity; when the single expression, "signs and lying wonders," demonstrates that they could not be meant. Antichrist indeed has made strenuous efforts as an unmasked infidel; yet these short-lived appearances must not be compared with the permanent and wide-spread mischiefs of one thousand three hundred years. The original words may mean, either false and lying pretences to the power of working miracles, and the impostures by which they are rendered plausible; or they may relate to things really supernatural, when performed in support of false doctrine, and claims to a divine authority, in propagating it. (Notes, Ex. 7:11,12. Deut. 13:1-5. 2 Tim. 3:6-9.)—Damned. (12) The original is judged, as in several other places; and, in such awful declarations, a needless and ungrounded asperity of language, in the translation, only gives occasion to objections, and so weakens the general effect. Yet, in this place, the meaning is unequivocal, and judging such characters, as are here described, at the coming of the Lord, must terminate in their eternal condemnation. But this is not always the case, when the same word is used. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29-34.) apostle meant, the beginning of the gospel being preached to them; but he plainly distinguished this choice of them, from their calling, and spoke of the latter as the effect of the former.

—The doctrine of election has been repeatedly considered. (Marg. Ref. m—p.—Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 9:10—14. Eph. 1:3—12.) We may here add, that if the “calling” of the Thessalonians was the effect of any preceding choice of them; it comes to the same thing, whether that choice was made the preceding day, or from “before the foundation of the world,” or from eternity; except as the immutable perfections and purposes of God and his absolutely perfect prescience are concerned. Otherwise, if he acted wisely and righteously in choosing them, rather than their companions in idolatry and vice; it was equally wise and righteous to choose them from eternity, as at the very hour or moment preceding their regeneration.—This choice of them, however, was “to salvation,” and it had not been made, because he foresaw they would be holy, nor yet with the purpose of leaving them unholy; but with the purpose of preparing them for heavenly happiness, “through the sanctification of the Spirit,” and his new-creating energy beginning, carrying on, and perfecting their renewal to the divine image: and through their “belief of the truth,” as here opposed to the lie of the man of sin. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, 8—12. 1 Pet. 1:1—5, 22—25.) For when they had been “quickened from the death of sin,” he led them to believe the several truths of the word of God, especially those relating to the Person and Redemption of Christ, “the truth as it is in Jesus;” thus they were brought to receive him, and rely on him for pardon, righteousness, and grace; and so they received their title to heavenly felicity, and were trained up for the enjoyment of it. According to these purposes of God respecting them, he “had called them by the gospel,” which Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy were sent to preach to them: this “came to them not in word only, but with the power of the Holy Ghost;” and their conversion by it both evidenced their “election of God,” and was designed in order to “their obtaining the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.” (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, 1 Thes. 1:1—3. 2:13—16. 5:4—11.)—“How wisely and happily does the apostle unite the views of the grace of God and the duties of men! while he represents our choice ‘to salvation in a light so worthy of God; since this salvation is still to be obtained, “through ‘sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth.’” Doddridge.

15 Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have

Note.—The apostle exhorted his beloved brethren, “by the mercies of God” bestowed on them, (Notes, Rom. 12:1,2.) to “stand fast,” in the belief of those truths, which they had heard from him, not only amidst the rage of persecutors, but against the artifices of deceivers: maintaining the instructions, which he had given them, whether by word of mouth when with them, or by any verbal message, or by his former epistle. (Marg. Ref. 1 Thes. 3:6—13. 4:1—8.)—Doubtless the apostle’s oral “traditions” were worthy of credence and obedience; but how should we, at this day, know any thing of them, except as they were written for our benefit? It is therefore a singular instance of the “deceivableness of unrighteousness” in “the man of sin,” to attempt the support of his corrupt system, by a single word in that very chapter, which most fully exposes his devices. For oral traditions, of equal authority to the written word, being the rule of its interpretation, and committed to the keeping of the church, (that is, to the Romish clergy,) has been the grand support of popery for ages: and of this fundamental principle they have no better scriptural proof, than this single word, and one or two more of similar import! (Notes, Matt. 15:1—20.)

Note.—The apostle here addressed himself in prayer, to “our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father,” and he mentioned Christ first, in this most evident act of divine adoration: for “He and the Father are One,” and, with the Holy Spirit the Comforter, that one God, “who had loved them, and given them everlasting consolation,” a well-spring of comfort in his gospel, and by his Spirit in their hearts, which would endure to eternity, and of which they then enjoyed the earnest. (Marg. Ref. b. d.—Note, John 4:10—15, v. 14.) He had also given them a “good hope,” well-grounded, of a good, a suitable, and sufficient portion and felicity, which originated from his mercy, and was evidenced and sanctioned by his grace in their hearts; and which produced the most beneficial effects in their lives, and supported them under their manifold trials. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Rom. 5:1—5. 15:8—13. Tit. 1:1—4. Heb. 6:10—15. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 3:13—16. 1 John 3:1—3, v. 3.) He therefore besought “our Lord Jesus Christ

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, to caution men against expectations not warranted by scripture; but grounded on impressions, pretended revelations, and perversions of the word of God: for Satan makes immense use of these delusions, not only to unsettle men's minds, and fill them with needless apprehensions, but even to shake the foundations of their faith and hope, to draw them off from their duty, and to expose the gospel itself to ridicule and contempt, from scoffers of all descriptions. It is sufficient for us to know that our Lord will come, and will "gather all his saints" unto him; and we should be careful to be always ready for his coming; and to guard against delusions and presumption, in respect to the exact time of that great event. We know, however, that "the scripture cannot be broken:" the day of Christ could not come, till the predicted apostacy had taken place. These prophecies have now in a great measure received their completion, and confirm our assured belief of the truth of the scriptures: but, though "the son of perdition" has been revealed; though he has "opposed and exalted himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped;" and has spoken and acted, as if he were a deity upon earth, who had a right to be adored in the temple of God himself; though "the mystery of iniquity," after working long in secret, at length was brought to light; and "the lawless one" openly proclaimed his arrogance, enforced his presumptuous decrees, and supported his delusions, by the working of Satan, with lying miracles, and all kinds of impostures: yet, the Lord has not yet fully "destroyed him with the brightness of his coming;" and many more immensely important prophecies still remain to be fulfilled, before the end shall come.—But let us observe, that Satan does most mischief by those, who, like Judas, profess themselves disciples and apostles, and sell Christ for money: these are emphatically "sons of perdition" and "men of sin." (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. P. O. 9—14. Matt. 21:12, 13. P. O. 12—16. Rev. 18:11—19. P. O. 9—19.)—Avarice, pride, and ambition are always hateful; but they are most diabolical, when employed about spiritual things: and there have indeed been many Antichrists; yet no one has been so mischievous, as he "who seated himself in the temple of God."

V. 5—12.

The world, in every age, has been replete with cheats and forgeries; yet none are so iniquitous or impious as those which some have called "pious frauds;" and "Satan transformed into an angel of light," (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) carries on his trade of destruction, by means of "lying signs" and miracles, or other species of "the deceivableness of unrighteousness" with more fatal effect than in any other character, or by any other engine. However, neither "the father of lies," nor any of his children, can go further, or proceed more rapidly, than the only wise God is pleased to permit. Every event takes place in the appointed season; and, after all the mysterious devices of iniquity, which Satan or wicked men can frame, "the counsel of God shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" nay, one Antichristian power has often been employed, far besides his purpose, to stop the progress of another, still more pestiferous.—It will at last appear that none were deceived by any "energy of delusion," who were not, at heart, enemies to the truth and will of God, and who continued to "take pleasure in unrighteousness:" he is constantly permitting the devil to seduce persons of this character into the belief of some lie, by which they are held, as with fetters of iron, till they receive their merited condemnation. To avoid this fatal doom, men should take heed not to repress their convictions from love of sin, but to reverence the dictates and admonitions of conscience, by which God speaks to them emphatically, and with special application. They should pray earnestly for "the love of the truth," and for saving faith as inseparably connected with it: for many fall away and perish, who have "the knowledge of the truth;" but "the love of the truth" "accompanies salvation," and never fails.—They should also use every means of obtaining that humble and spiritual mind, which is the best and the only security against every fatal delusion.

V. 13—17.

If we now hate sin, and love the truth, "we are bound to thank God" for ourselves, and for each other. Many can well remember the time, when they despised or hated the doctrines of scripture, and preferred soothing errors; nay, some of us seemed awfully to provoke God "to send us strong delusion to believe a lie;" and we should certainly have held it fast, if we had been left to ourselves. If then it be now otherwise, we may thankfully ascribe it to the love of God, to his special unmerited mercy and grace; who from the "beginning chose us unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." But let none conclude themselves chosen and called, who are strangers to the "sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus." (Notes, 2 Tim. 1:9. 1 Pet. 1:1, 2.) Let none place saving faith in any thing, but real efficacious "belief of the truth," as revealed in scripture. This "belief of the truth" brings the sinner to rely on Christ, and thus to love and obey him; it is sealed by the Holy Spirit upon his heart, and it prepares him for the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ in heaven. Let us then stand fast in this doctrine of the apostles, and reject all spurious additions from every quarter: let us not hesitate to pray "to our Lord Jesus himself," as well as to our loving "God and Father;" that our interest in his "everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace" may be proved; not only by his "comforting our hearts," but by his "establishing us in every good word and work."

Then we may, even in the most afflicted circumstances, look down with pity on the wealthiest of those, who have only the perishing consolations and hopes of this vain world; or the vain confidence, which attends the contempt, neglect, or perversion, of the gospel of God our Saviour.—For what are all the joys and comforts of this transient and unquiet scene, compared with “everlasting consolation,” a joy which shall never be taken from us, never impaired, never lose its relish; but increase more and more to all eternity.

CHAP. III.

The apostle requests the prayers of the Thessalonians, especially for the success of his ministry; expresses his confidence respecting them; and prays for them, 1—5. He charges them to censure and withdraw from disorderly walkers, who neglected their own business, and intermeddled in that of others; interspersing suitable arguments, directions, and exhortations, 6—15. He concludes with benedictions, 16—18.

FINALLY, brethren, <sup>a</sup> pray for us, that <sup>b</sup> the word of the Lord may * have free course, and <sup>c</sup> be glorified, <sup>d</sup> even as it is with you;

2 And that we may be <sup>e</sup> delivered from † unreasonable and wicked men: <sup>f</sup> for all men have not faith.

3 But <sup>g</sup> the Lord is faithful, who shall <sup>h</sup> establish you, <sup>i</sup> and keep you from evil.

4 And <sup>k</sup> we have confidence in the Lord touching you, <sup>l</sup> that ye both do and will do the things which we command you.

5 And <sup>m</sup> the Lord direct your hearts <sup>n</sup> into the love of God, <sup>o</sup> and into * the patient waiting for Christ.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle, drawing to a conclusion, requested the Thessalonians to pray for him and his fellow-laborers, and for success to their ministry; (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, Rom. 15:30,33. Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.) “that the word of the Lord” Jesus, concerning him and his salvation, “might run,” and be glorified, that it might be diffused by a rapid progress, from heart to heart, and from place to place, from one family to another, from one town or city to another, through divers nations: (Notes, John 1:35—46.) and that its excellent nature and effects might be manifested, in the conversion of numbers from idolatry and wickedness, to the true worship of God; and in the holy lives, and the evident increasing fruitfulness, of professed Christians; even as the glory of the gospel had been most signally displayed among them. All this, and more seems implied, in the words, “may run and be glorified.” (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Notes, 1 Thes. 1:5—10. 2:13—16.)—He requested them also, to pray for the protection of him and the other preachers of the gospel, from the malice and violence of perverse and wicked men, such as the Jewish zealots were; whom no arguments could convince, no persuasion or kindness mollify: for their prejudices, the effect of their perverseness and wickedness, hurried them into all kinds of crimes, in order to oppose and destroy the apostle, and others who preached Christ to the Gentiles. The blind devotees of the pagan idolatry, whom the Jews stirred up to aid their persecutions, may also be intended. Notwithstanding the abundance of miracles, and the fulfilment of prophecies, which evinced the truth of the gospel; “all men had not faith” to believe it, that being the effect of a divine power upon the heart, which overcame the carnal pride, obstinacy, and enmity of fallen nature. Probably, some Judaizing Christians secretly concurred with more open enemies, in attempting the life of the apostle; and these false brethren, having no real faith in Christ, were also destitute of faithfulness, in their professed friendship to him and his fellow-laborers; so that no confidence could be placed in them. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) But “the Lord is faithful” to his promises: (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 10:13. 1 Thes. 5:23—28.) and the apostle was fully persuaded, that the Thessalonians were true believers, whom God would establish in the faith, and defend against the devices of “the wicked one,” and of evil men; and keep from the evil of sin, and all its fatal effects. (Marg. Ref. g—k.—Notes, Matt. 6:13. 2 Tim. 4:16—18.) He had also confidence in the Lord respecting them, that he would give them grace, to incline and enable them, both at present and in future, to observe all the directions and commandments, which he had given or should give them. He therefore prayed, that God would guide and lead their hearts, into the comfortable experience of his love towards them, and into the exercise of love to him; (Notes, John 15:9—11. Jude 20, 21.) and into the “patience of Christ,” that patience which he exemplified, taught, required, and bestowed; even a resignation of soul under sufferings, meekness and long-suffering under injuries, “patient continuance in well-doing,” and a disposition calmly to wait for the Lord’s time of deliverance. (Marg. Ref. l—n.) As it is the work of the Holy Spirit to direct and lead the soul into these holy tempers, and a consistent conduct; and as “the Lord” is here mentioned, distinct from God, and from Christ, it has been supposed, with some probability, that the apostle addressed this prayer personally to the Holy Spirit, “the Lord the Spirit,” the third person in the adorable Trinity.

7 For yourselves know <sup>t</sup> how ye ought to follow us: <sup>u</sup> for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you;

8 Neither did we <sup>v</sup> eat any man's bread for nought; <sup>w</sup> but wrought with labor and travail, <sup>x</sup> night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you:

9 <sup>a</sup> Not because we have not power; but <sup>b</sup> to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us.

Note.—The church at Thessalonica was in general deserving of high commendation; but the apostle had occasion to speak with authority and implied reproof, in one particular, of which he had before given some intimation. (Note, 1 Thes. 4:9—12.) He therefore "commanded," or "charged them, in the name," and as they valued the authority, favor, and glory, "of the Lord Jesus;" that they would "withdraw from every" one, called a Christian brother, who "walked disorderly," like a soldier that quitted his ranks or deserted his post. (Marg. Ref. p—s.) For they well knew, in what respects they ought to imitate him and his brethren; who had not behaved "disorderly among them," or done any thing inconsistent with the regularity of families, or of society. In particular, they had not lived at other people's expense, or in idleness: on the contrary, they had wrought, with very great labor and fatigue, to earn a maintenance for themselves; even during the night, when the day did not suffice for that, and for the exercise of their ministry also. Thus they avoided being "chargeable to any" person, that they might excite no prejudice against the gospel. Not that they had no right to a maintenance, or power to require one, by the rule of the gospel; but because, in their circumstances, they counted it necessary to endure much hardship, that they might become a proper example for their converts to imitate. (Marg. Ref. t—b.—Notes, 1 Cor. 9:7—18. 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 12:11—13. Phil. 4:14—20. 1 Thes. 2:1—8.)—Withdraw. (6) 'It is taken from sailors, who 'by a beuded course, avoid a rock. 10 For even <sup>c</sup> when we were with you, this we commanded you, <sup>d</sup> that if any would not work, neither should he eat.

11 For we hear that there are some which <sup>e</sup> walk among you disorderly, <sup>f</sup> working not at all, but are busy bodies.

12 Now them that are such <sup>g</sup> we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>h</sup> that with quietness they work, and <sup>i</sup> eat their own bread.

Note.—Perhaps, the apostle had perceived a disposition, in some persons at Thessalonica, to make religion a pretence for indolence, and for subsisting on the hospitality and liberality of their brethren, without working at their own trades or occupations.—'How they might fall 'into this evil is easy to conceive. Persons all 'alive to God and his Christ, and knowing little 'of the deceitfulness of the heart, and the crafts 'of Satan, might find it irksome to attend to the 'concerns of this life. It was a fault indeed, and 'very dangerous if' persisted in: but as it was 'soon corrected in all probability, and in part 'occasioned by the strength of heavenly affections, one cannot be very severe in censuring 'it. ... It may be worth while for those, who 'feel themselves much irritated against similar 'evils, attending on the outpouring of the Holy 'Spirit in our days, to consider, whether they 'do not exercise more candor toward the Thes'salonians, and respect them as real Christians; 'while they scorn those, who walk in their 'steps, as enthusiasts.' Jos. Milner, Ec. His-tory—The apostle, however, being fully aware of the consequences, had when he was with them commanded them, not to maintain in idleness such as could work and would not, either by private or public charity; that, being left to endure the pinchings of hunger and want, they might be compelled to attend to their proper duty.—God gives every thing to man in the way of labor: and, in fact, in all cases, the industrious part of every community maintains the slothful. (Marg. Ref. c, d.) The words may indeed signify; 'If any man refuse 'to work, he ought by all means to live without 'food: but, if that be impossible, let him thence 'learn to consider how unreasonable and iniquitous idleness is;' by which a man, who cannot but consume, does nothing to replenish the stores, which are thus exhausted. The expression was for substance a proverb among the Jews.—“They state it wrong, who render it, Let him not eat, who does not work; for none are more deserving of relief from others, than they, who, through some just and necessary impediment, cannot labor though they greatly desire it.” Beza.—This venerable reformer here takes occasion to expose the mendicant monks and friars, as exactly answering the character described by St. Paul.—How far relieving vagrant beggars, of whose character or incapacity for labor we know nothing, can consist with this rule, is worthy of inquiry. Certainly the money might be almost always better employed. (Note, Luke 18:35—43).—Whatever rank men sustain, they are mere drones in the hive, unless they fill up the duties of their station for the common benefit. Christians therefore should not countenance such evident injustice; especially as this has always been one of the slanders raised against the professed worshippers of God. (Notes, Ex. 5:8, 9, 15—23. P. O. 1—9.)—The kindness required from believers, and to which they are prone as under the influence of holy love, often gives slothful persons an opportunity, on various pretences, to seek exemption from labor, by which they become useless and mischievous; they and their families are often reduced to great distress; debts are contracted which they cannot pay; and that bounty is diverted into a wrong channel, which should encourage the industrious poor, and support the sick and afflicted. The apostle therefore reminded his beloved children at Thessalonica of this rule; because he heard that there were some of these “disorderly” persons among them, who did not work at their own trades or callings, but expected to be maintained in idleness by their brethren. These would naturally contract a sauntering, gossiping habit, and would indulge a talkative, curious, and conceited temper; and, having much leisure, they would intermeddle with other men’s concerns, to the disturbance of families, by exciting suspicions and jealousies among neighbors; and to the injury of men’s characters. But the apostle commanded, and charged them, in the name of Christ, and as they would stand accepted before his tribunal, to cease from this officiousness; and to attend to their own labor, with humility, modesty, contentment, and peaceable industry; that, thus subsisting on their own earnings, they might “eat their own bread,” and not consume what properly belonged to others. (Marg. Ref. f. h, i. Notes, Ex. 20:15. Matt. 6:11.) The difficulty, which modern missionaries, in most parts of the world, find in bringing those among whom they labor to habits of regular industry, the absolute necessity of doing this in order to any permanent success, and the very great impediments which indolence, as to regular daily employment, places in their way, well illustrates, the necessity and importance of the apostle’s charge in this particular. In all places, where missions have permanently succeeded, the converts, however indolent in mind or body before, have become industrious in some regular employment.

Note.—Should any one persist in disobeying the command, here given with so great solemnity and energy by the apostle, “to labor with quietness, and eat his own bread;” the other Christians were directed to “note him,” by some token of full disapprobation; and every Christian was required to separate from his company or intimacy, that he might be put to shame, and brought to repentance. Thus the scandal would be prevented, and the credit of Christianity maintained. (*Marg. Ref. l—n.—Notes, Matt. 18:15—17. Rom. 16:17—20. 1 Cor. 5:1—5, 9—13. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The success of the gospel is as really promoted by fervent prayer, as by faithful preaching.—All, in whose conversion it has “been glorified,” should labor to honor it in their lives; and they should desire and pray constantly and fervently, that it “may have free course, and be glorified,” in the same manner all over the earth. They ought also to beseech the Lord, to protect his faithful ministers against those “unreasonable and wicked men,” who may every where be met with, even among professed Christians, and who are equally destitute of faith and faithfulness; that they may not be discouraged by their most virulent or determined opposition. Our whole dependence, however, must be upon the faithfulness of God to his promises, who will surely establish those who humbly rely on him by obedient faith, and preserve them from every fatal snare, “deliver them from every evil work, from evil” of all kinds, and from the evil one; “and preserve them to his heavenly kingdom.” If, by his special grace, we have that faith, which multitudes have not, our obligations to him are immense; and we should earnestly apply to him to incline and enable us, perseveringly and without reserve, to obey all his commands; and that “the Lord the Spirit” may “direct our hearts into the love of God and the patience of Christ,” and persevering diligence in every good work. (Note, Jude 20,21.)

V. 6—18.

It is of great importance to the credit and success of the gospel, that the injunctions of the apostles be observed; and that believers “withdraw from every brother who walketh disorderly,” and habitually neglects or violates the precepts of scripture. Pious men are often betrayed into a disregard to this rule, through humility and tenderness: by which means the misconduct of one professed believer turns to the scandal of his profession, and he himself is soothed into carnal security, by an ill-judged and unkind lenity.—Whatever difficulties occur respecting public discipline; believers of every denomination might agree, in separating from disorderly walkers, with proper admonitions and exhortations; that thus being “put to shame” they might be brought to repentance. This would be so far from “counting them as enemies,” that it would be the wisest exercise of brotherly love.—It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, to show the tendency of their doctrine in their own conduct, that the people may perceive “how they ought to imitate them.” It is not indeed required, or generally expected, that they should “labor and toil, night and day, to avoid being chargeable” to the people: for they “that preach the gospel, have a right to live of the gospel;” and if, faithful and diligent in their work, they by no means “eat any man’s bread for nought.” Yet they should be very careful to avoid every appearance of selfishness, indolence, or an encroaching spirit; and they must often give up their own interest, indulgence, and inclination, to make themselves an example to the people, and to give energy to their instructions.—A slothful man is a scandal to any society, but most of all to a religious society. It would be deemed rigorous, should we enforce the apostle’s rule, “that if any willet not to work, neither shall he eat:” yet, in fact, it is founded in equity and love. It is injustice to the indigent, the weak, and the industrious, when the bounty of their brethren is wasted on the indolent and extravagant. The greatest kindness, which can be shown to the latter, is to constrain them, if possible, “to labor, working with their own hands the thing which is good:” this alone can preserve them from mischief, temptation, and misery. (Note, Eph. 4:28.) None can "eat their own bread," who are not willing, in some way, to labor for it. Those who neglect their own business, become "busy-bodies," officious intermeddlers, tale-bearers, and disturbers of the peace of families, churches, and communities: for 'Satan finds some mischief still, for idle hands to do.' Persons of this description ought therefore to be discountenanced, rebuked, and "commanded from the Lord Jesus, with quietness to labor and eat their own bread;" and, if they refuse to do this, they should be censured, noted, and shunned by all believers, till brought to repentance.—No abuses, however, of this or any other kind, should make us "weary of well-doing," check our bounty to proper objects, or our genuine good-will to the most unworthy.—While we use every means of peace, in our private or public capacity; we must still pray to "the Lord of peace;" "to give us peace always, and by all means;" and that he would be with us, and confer his grace on us and all our brethren.

TO

THE time, when this epistle was written, constitutes the principal difficulty respecting it. It was long the general opinion, that the apostle wrote it soon after he was driven from Ephesus on account of the tumult excited by Demetrius and his craftsmen. (Acts 19:21—40. 20:1.) But several very learned and respectable men have, in modern times, started objections against this opinion, which they think insurmountable.—There is no reasonable doubt, that the second Epistle to the Corinthians was written, during the apostle's abode in Macedonia, after he came thither from Ephesus. But it is evident that Timothy was with him when he wrote that epistle; for his name is inserted in the superscription. (2 Cor. 1:1. Note, 2 Cor. 2:12, 13.)—How then, say they, could he have been left at Ephesus, and entreated to abide there? (1:3.)—And as to the only solution of the difficulty, which can be thought of, viz. that 'Timothy might follow ... so soon after as to be with the apostle in Macedonia, when he wrote 'his epistle to the Corinthians; that supposition is inconsistent with the terms and tenor of 'the epistle throughout. For the writer speaks uniformly of his intention to return to Timothy at Ephesus; and not of his expecting Timothy to come to him in Macedonia. (3:14, 15, 4:13.)—Therefore I concur with Bishop Pearson, in placing the date of the epistle, and the 'history referred to in it, at a period subsequent to St. Paul's first imprisonment, and consequent to the era up to which the Acts of the Apostles bring his history.' Paley. This is a fair statement of the main objection; though some things of inferior moment will require a little attention. It may, however, be questioned, whether the conclusion here deduced, does not lie open to still more insuperable objections. Some regard may be due to the total silence of the scripture, as to any subsequent visit of the apostle to Ephesus, and his departure thence to Macedonia.—It is indeed allowed, that during his imprisonment at Rome, he mentions in his epistles, a purpose of visiting several places in the eastern regions. (Phil. 2:24. Philem. 22. Heb. 13:19, 23.) And in his second epistle to Timothy, it appears, that he had been at several places in the neighborhood of Ephesus. Still, however, there is no intimation that he visited Ephesus. He observes, in the close of this epistle, that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus; which may imply, that he had not gone thither himself.—Indeed, whether it be allowed, according to historical records which are not very satisfactory, that he hastened from Crete to Rome, hearing accounts which induced him to think that his presence there was necessary; or whether his persecutors seized on him, and conveyed him to Rome, in an unexpected manner; it seems evident that he was hurried out of these regions, before he had time to accomplish his purposes, in the manner which he wished to do. (Notes, 2 Tim. 4:12—20.) It might also be brought as an objection to this opinion, that Timothy, after the conclusion of St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, must, on any computation, have been above thirty years of age; and though, at that time of life, the exhortation to flee youthful lusts might not be unseasonable; (2 Tim. 2:22.) yet the caution, "Let no man despise thy youth," (4:12.) seems not so consistent.—But the grand difficulty arises from the words of the apostle to the Ephesian Elders at Miletus: "And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more." It is evident, that the persons present understood this, not as a conjecture, or as 'a desponding inference,' but as a prediction. When the apostle perceived the overwhelming sorrow, which it had excited in them, he neither retracted nor qualified it: and it seems unquestionable that the historian records it as a prophecy. (Notes, Acts 20:25—27, 36—38.) The words 'Ye all, &c.' confine the interpretation to the persons present: the prediction therefore would be exactly fulfilled, though the apostle visited many places in that neighborhood; nay, though he purposed (which is not likely) to visit Ephesus, provided he did not actually go thither, or meet any of the elders to whom he gave the charge at Miletus.—It can hardly be supposed, that after an absence of perhaps rather more than ten years, the apostle revisiting Ephesus, found, that all the elders whom he had addressed at Miletus were dead. But, except on this very improbable supposition, or on that of the words before adduced being a mere conjecture, in which the event proved the apostle to have been mistaken; we must adhere to the old opinion, that this epistle was written immediately after the apostle had left Ephesus to go into Macedonia: because it is, on every other supposition, almost, if not absolutely certain, that he never after left Ephesus to go into Macedonia. But let us next consider, whether the objections above so cogently stated, against the ancient opinion, may not be satisfactorily answered.—The apostle must have spent some considerable time in Macedonia, after he left Ephesus, and before he went to Corinth: for “he went over to those parts, and gave them much exhortation.” (Acts 20:2.) Now, it is not in the least improbable, that unforeseen circumstances might induce Timothy to leave Ephesus, sooner than either he or the apostle had intended. The virulence of the persecutors might drive him thence; or he might need some counsel and instruction, in respect of the false teachers, or on some special points, which had occurred to him concerning the state of the church.—Various circumstances, indeed, might render it inexpedient for him to continue at Ephesus, according to the plan at first formed. On the other hand, it is probable, the apostle wrote this epistle as soon as he arrived in Macedonia: and at that time he might fully purpose, and confidently hope, to go to Timothy at Ephesus, and yet be disappointed.—Thus, he had “once and again,” purposed to return to Thessalonica; “but Satan hindered him.” (1 Thes. 2:18.) Thus he had seen cause to alter his plan, in respect of going to Corinth, even after he had given some intimations of it. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:15—20.)—It may not improbably be conjectured, that the apostle, when he left Ephesus, expected that Timothy would abide there, till he had accomplished his business in Macedonia and Achaia; and that he should be enabled to go to him at Ephesus; as he took his voyage to Jerusalem with the contributions of the churches: but, having been induced, by the malicious designs of the Jews, to go from Corinth through Macedonia; so much time had elapsed, that he found it necessary to sail past Ephesus, lest he should not arrive at Jerusalem by the feast of Pentecost. This might derange one part of his plan; and the departure of Timothy from Ephesus would defeat another. (Notes, Acts 20:1—6, 13—16.)—As the difficulties on this side seem to me far less, than those on the other, I adhere, though with diffidence, to the ancient opinion, and shall comment on the epistle accordingly.—The history, in the Acts of the Apostles, implies, that Timothy continued with the apostle, during his progress through Macedonia, and his abode at Corinth: and that he returned with him through Macedonia into Asia. But Timothy is not afterwards mentioned, as accompanying the apostle, either to Jerusalem, or in his subsequent imprisonment at Cæsarea, or in his voyage to Rome: and it is probable, that he abode in Asia; and, accompanying the elders of Ephesus, when they parted from the apostles, he settled at that city for some years; according to the ancient records of the church concerning him.—But when four years or nearly had passed, it seems that he went to the apostle at Rome, and was imprisoned with him, but was soon set at liberty, and sent to Philippi. (Phil. 2:19. Heb. 13:23.)—In respect to Timothy, it is sufficient to refer to the account before given of his appointment to be St. Paul’s companion in travel. (Notes, Acts 16:1—5.) Having been trained up under the apostle’s immediate care; he imbibed, in an extraordinary degree, his spirit and principles, and was peculiarly beloved by him. The apostle, when suddenly driven from Ephesus, had left Timothy behind him to settle the concerns of that church, in the best manner he could; and wrote this epistle to him for his direction in so doing.—Whether the above conjecture (for we have no authentic records to direct us,) of Timothy’s return to Ephesus and residence there, be well grounded, or not; these directions would not be in vain: for the substance of them would be equally applicable in any other church, to which he might be sent, or in which he might have resided.—Indeed, it does not appear that the apostle intended to give Timothy instructions exclusively, or even principally, respecting the Ephesian church; but rather general counsels for his conduct in the churches of Christ; and for that of all others, when called to act in similar circumstances.—‘Having done the work for which he was bid to stay at Ephesus, he might go on to other places, doing the work of an Evangelist, and settling ordinary church-governors, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, where they were wanting, and doing all other things mentioned in ‘this epistle, as things to be performed in the church of God.’ Whitby.—The epistle contains cautions against false teachers; directions concerning the worship of God, and the behavior of believers; the character and conduct to be required in bishops and deacons, and their families; exhortations to Timothy, concerning his private and public behavior, especially in ordaining ministers, censuring offenders, and settling the other affairs of the church: admonitions against several sins and temptations; solemn charges to faithfulness, and various doctrinal and practical counsels and instructions interwoven with them. ‘This, and the two following epistles, are peculiarly replete with instruction to ministers; and should be continually studied, and meditated on, by all who bear that sacred character, or are preparing for the good work of the ministry.—The postscript dates the epistle from Laodicea; but it is almost certain that the apostle had never visited that city when he wrote this epistle. (Col. 2:1.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes Timothy, 1,2; reminds him for what purpose he was left at Ephesus, 3,4; shows that "the end of the commandment is love, from a pure heart, a good conscience, and unfeigned faith," 5; from which some having swerved, in attempting to preach the law had perverted it, 6,7. The law is good; but is intended to condemn transgressors, 8-10; which accords with the gospel also, 11. With deep humility and thankfulness, the apostle speaks of his own conversion, and the encouragement given by it to sinners in every age; and ascribes glory to God, 12-17. He charges Timothy to maintain faith and a good conscience; and mentions some, who had renounced the truth, and whom he had delivered unto Satan, 18-20.

2 Unto <sup>e</sup> Timothy, <sup>f</sup> my own son in the faith: <sup>g</sup> Grace, mercy and peace, from God our Father, and Jesus Christ our Lord.

Note.—In this address, Paul called himself "an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment of God our Saviour;" by which, in this connexion, the Person of the Father seems intended, as purposing salvation for sinners, forming the plan of it, and giving his own Son to be in human nature their Saviour: but, the Lord Jesus was joined in granting this commission, as being one with the Father, in essence, authority, and counsel. The apostle called "the Lord Jesus our Hope;" as all his hope of salvation and eternal happiness was fixed upon the Person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ. (Marg. Ref. a-d.—Notes, Rom. 5:1-5. 15:8-13. Eph. 1:9-14. Col. 1:25-27. 1 Pet. 1:3-5, 17-21.) He also addressed Timothy, as his "own son" in the faith, or his genuine Son. In all probability he was the instrument of Timothy's conversion; he had, as it were, educated him in the gospel, and Timothy revered him, and served with him in his ministry as a dutiful son with a loving Father. (Notes, Acts 16:1-3. Phil. 2:19-23.) From the exuberance of his love to Timothy he added the word "mercy" to his usual salutation; or perhaps because his peculiar trials and services would require peculiar consolations, from the compassion and mercy of the Lord towards him. (Marg. Ref. e-g.)—God our Saviour. (1) 'The Father saves us, 'as reconciled to him in the Son; and the son 'saves us, as reconciled in his flesh.' *Beza. (Notes, Is. 12:1,2. 3 As I besought thee to abide still <sup>h</sup> at Ephesus, <sup>i</sup> when I went into Macedonia, that thou mightest <sup>k</sup> charge some that they teach no other doctrine,

Note.—The apostle left Timothy at Ephesus, when he went thence into Macedonia; (Preface;) that he might solemnly and constantly charge certain persons to teach no other doctrines, than what he had done. (Marg. Ref. k.—Note, Gal. 1:6-10.) The Judaizers would be sure to take the opportunity of St. Paul's absence to propagate their tenets: and he knew them to be zealous for the traditions and fabulous pretences of the Elders and Pharisees, as well as for the Mosaic law. But the Ephesians must be warned not to take notice of such fables; or of their genealogies, which related to their descent from Abraham, or the patriarchs, or from Aaron, or David, by which they imagined themselves entitled to peculiar privileges. These genealogies led to endless intricacies and perplexities, and to many difficult questions and useless controversies; and they rather induced a carnal presumption and a self-confident temper; than led to any improvement in godliness and holiness of heart and life; which could only be maintained and increased by faith in the truth and promises of God, through Jesus Christ. This charge therefore was to be steadfastly observed by him. (Marg. Ref. l-n.—Notes, Col. 2:5-23.)—Some imagine, that "endless genealogies," denote the extravagant and indeed unintelligible notions of the Gnostics and other heretics, about the origin of the world; and various fictions and vain imaginations: (Note, Tit. 3:9.) but the context seems to determine in favor of the interpretation before given; and it may well be questioned, whether any of these heretics had, at so early a period, openly propagated their incoherent and profane jargon.—Godly edifying. (4) Or "Edification of God;" 'because it hath God for its Object and End, 'as tending to the true knowledge and right 'worship of God: it is efficiently from him, ... to mean the revelation of God to men, by the gospel; the end of which is to restore fallen sinners to the love required by the law: and this better suits the context. But others explain it of "the charge" given to Timothy by the apostle; and this seems to be the right interpretation, for thus it had reference both to the law as the rule of duty, and to the grand design of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) The "charity," or love, here spoken of, must arise out of "a pure heart," the soul having been cleansed by renewing grace, from the love and pollution of sin, and from carnal enmity and selfishness: (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, 1 Pet. 1: 22—25.) and a "good conscience;" or one well informed concerning the will of God, and made tender and active by divine grace, as well as purged from guilt by the blood of Christ; that so the possessor might be influenced to act conscientiously in his whole conduct. (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Acts 24:10—21, v. 16. 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12. Heb. 9:11—14. 13:18,19, v. 18. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) It must also come from "unfeigned faith," or a sincere belief of divine testimony, the truths revealed in the sacred scripture; and a reliance on Christ, and the promises of God through him. This "faith, working by love," "purifying the heart," and producing "a good conscience," constituted the substance of what the apostle ordered Timothy to give in charge to the Ephesian teachers; because it comprised the grand essentials of evangelical religion. The several characteristics of love, here given, admirably distinguish it from the spurious charity which is, in modern time, the favorite virtue of the world.—It is not the natural growth of the human heart, but exists only in a heart purified by divine grace. It grows out of "a good conscience," and is inseparable from it; not sacrificing truth and common sense, as well as conscience, to the phantom of candor and liberality: it springs from faith, instead of being independent of it and superseding it. Note.—From this love, and purity, and conscientiousness, some professed Christians had swerved, or deviated, out of zeal for external distinctions, legal observances, and human traditions. Thus they turned aside from the faith also, and got engaged in vain janglings, and angry controversies, about doubtful points of small consequence. (Marg. Ref. u, x.) For they were desirous of being "teachers or doctors of the law;" and to exercise that office among Christians, in order to acquire a reputation for learning, and to be called Rabbi: (Notes, Matt. 23:5—10.) but they "neither understood what they said, nor whereof they affirmed," with full and unqualified confidence. They declaimed, in a perplexed and inconclusive manner, upon general topics; not understanding the spiritual nature and uses of the moral law, which they attempted to explain; nor the typical import of those abrogated ceremonies, which they enforced. Note.—The apostle, and indeed all competent ministers and established Christians, "knew that the law was good" in itself, or for its intended purposes, provided "a man used it lawfully," according to its real import, and the design of the great Law-giver. The moral law "is holy, just, and good," resulting from the nature of God and man, and men's relations to him and to each other. Even the ceremonial law had a relative goodness, for the time, as typical of Christ and the gospel; and the entire Mosaic dispensation was good; as separating Israel from other nations, affording them the means of grace, and introducing Christianity. (Marg. Ref. a, b. -Notes, Deut. 32:4. Rom. 7:7-12. Gal. 3:19-22.) But to enforce the Mosaic law on Christians; or to teach them to depend on their own obedience to any part of it for justification, was contrary to the real meaning of the law itself and the intention of the Law-giver. It was evident, even from the books of Moses, when properly understood, that "Christ was the End of the law for righteousness to every believer;" and that the strict demands and awful sanction of the law itself, were intended to show the Israelites, that they could not be justified by it, but must live by faith in the promised Saviour. (Notes, Rom. 10:1-4. Gal. 5:1-6.) As, therefore, believers were righteous persons in God's appointed way, both as to their justified state and obedient conduct, the law was not enacted against them. Indeed laws in general were not made to coerce the well-disposed subject, but the ill-affected: and the case was the same in respect of the divine law. Its design (as far as it is penal) is to restrain and condemn the wicked: not to hold the humble in servile bondage by its curse; though its precept will be, of course, the rule of their conduct and the standard of their duty.—"The law is not made against the righteous." This seems a fair translation, and certainly is the meaning of the words.—"If a man use it lawfully;" 'that is,' says Theodoret, 'if he comply with the scope of it, which is to bring him to Christ. ... The law was not made to condemn the just man: for against such there is no law condemning them;' (Gal. 5:23.) but it lies against the lawless to condemn them.' Whitby.—After the general terms of "lawless and disobedient," which relate to the disregard and contempt of God's commandments, as manifested in the outward conduct; the apostle mentions the "ungodly and sinners," or those who neglect their duties to God and their neighbors; and "unholy and profane," which may refer to the gross sensuality and debauchery of multitudes, and that daring impiety commonly connected with it. He then enumerates some particular crimes of the most atrocious nature. (Marg. Ref. c-o.) Doubtless numerous instances of each were found among the Gentiles, and some perhaps among the bigoted Jews, who depended on the law, or on some law, and yet scandalously broke their own rule of conduct. (Rom. 2:12-29.) "Men stealers," are inserted among these daring criminals, against whom the law of God directed its awful curses. (Note, Ex. 21:15-17.) These were persons who kidnapped men to sell them for slaves: and this practice seems inseparable from the other iniquities and oppressions of slavery; nor can a slave-dealer by any means keep free from this atrocious criminality, if indeed 'the receiver be as 'bad as the thief.'—"They who make war for 'the inhuman purpose of selling the vanquished for slaves, as is the practice among African 'princes, are really man-stealers. And they, 'who, like African traders, encourage their unchristian traffic, by purchasing that which they 'know to be thus unjustly acquired, are partakers in their crimes.' Macknight. The clause should have been, 'know, or have reason to 'suspect.' This is the only species of theft which is punishable with death, by the law of God. (Ex. 21:16.)—The apostle did not mean, that none but persons of so infamous a character lay under "the curse of the law;" but that it was directed against all other practices, which were "contrary to sound doctrine," or the salutary nature and tendency of the Christian revelation. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, Tit. 2:1, 2.) According to this, every impenitent sinner, every man who allowed himself in the practice of any known transgression, remained under the covenant and curse of the law. This accorded to "the gospel of the glory of the blessed God." (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:3-6.) as entrusted to the apostle by which he displayed all his perfections in the most honorable and harmonious manner, by saving believers from their sins, as well as from wrath: (Note, Rom. 2:12-16.) for, being "the blessed God," the Perfection and Source of felicity, as well as of holiness, he had devised to render fallen men partakers of his happiness, by renewing them to the participation of his holiness. ° exceeding abundant, <sup>f</sup> with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.

Note.—The consideration, that he “had been intrusted with the gospel of the glory of the blessed God,” awakened in the apostle’s mind humble and admiring gratitude, and he burst forth into adoring thanks to Christ Jesus, for his distinguished mercy to him; both by conferring on him abundantly miraculous powers; and by enduing him richly with the courage, resolution, and patience of faith, hope, and love. (Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13.) Thus he had “enabled him” and qualified him, for this honorable service; and had “counted him faithful,” a proper person to be employed as his steward and ambassador; which he had evinced “by putting him into the ministry,” and owning him as his apostle. This was, in all respects, most astonishing grace; seeing he had before been a most daring “blasphemer” of his name, and had compelled others to blaspheme it; he had furiously persecuted Christ’s disciples, and most injuriously haled them to prison, with bitter sarcasms and reproaches, and sought to put them to death, from entire enmity to the name and cause of their Lord! (Marg. Ref. v.—a.—Notes, Acts 9:1—6. 26:9—11.) But, though his conduct had been so aggravated, he “had obtained mercy:” for his sins were not absolutely unpardonable, because he had perpetrated them “ignorantly in unbelief;” whereas, if his knowledge had been greater, and if his malice had been exerted against the full convictions of his own conscience, he would have been given up to final impenitence. His ignorance and unbelief, indeed, amidst such abundant means of information and conviction, were the result of a self-sufficient, obstinate, and contemptuous prejudice against the truth; yet he “verily thought that he ought to do many things against the name of Jesus,” and was in no sense convinced that he was the Messiah: but there were others, who were hurried on by malice, ambition, and selfishness, to act in direct opposition to the dictates of their own consciences, and thus to “sin against the Holy Spirit;” by maliciously ascribing his undeniable operations to human imposture, or satanical influence. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. Heb. 6:4—6. 10:26—31. 1 John 5:16—18.)—It is remarkable, that many persons have supposed Paul’s proud and wilful ignorance, and his consequent unbelief, (two sins, in themselves deserving of divine wrath, though in his circumstances they just preserved him from the unpardonable sin,) to have been a kind of meritorious cause of his obtaining mercy; especially when joined with his sincerity in opposing the gospel! (Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) They imagine that, in some manner or measure, he deserved mercy more than any who are left to perish. This they must mean, if they mean any thing to the purpose: for, though his guilt might be less than that of some Jews, who, sinning against clearer light and with more deliberate malice, were given up to final obduracy; yet, those who maintain the doctrine of salvation by grace suppose, that many perish in their sins, whose criminality is far less than his was; that he might most justly have thus been left to perish; and that no reason can by us be assigned for his salvation in preference to others, who had not committed the sin against the Holy Spirit, except the sovereign grace of God, “who hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth;” and the other reason, which the apostle himself next assigns, namely, “the praise of the glory of his grace.” (Notes, Rom. 5:20,21. 9:15—23. Eph. 1:3—8.) For he evidently confesses that he should have righteously perished, if the Lord had dealt with him according to strict justice; nay, if his grace and mercy had not been “exceedingly abundant” beyond all expectation, estimation, or conception; not only, in that he was ready to forgive, bless, and employ him, when he repented, believed, and was prepared for obedience; but, “in quickening him when dead in sin,” and so working faith and love to Jesus Christ in his heart, that he might be “found in him and be partaker of his righteousness.” “Faith and love,” which by the influence of his Spirit, were ‘implanted in my heart.’ *Doddridge. authenticated by every evidence which proves Christianity to be "the word of God, who cannot lie;" and it was "worthy to be received," with humble and thankful faith and cordial affection, by men of all nations and descriptions; as all are sinners and none can be saved in any other way, and as none are excluded from salvation who seek it in this way; (Notes, John 6:36—40. Acts 4:5—12, v. 12.) "that Jesus," Emmanuel, the Son of God, the Messiah, "came into the world to save sinners," voluntarily, with this express design, and for this single purpose. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) "The Word," who "was God and was with God," the Creator and Upholder of all worlds, the Lord of all creatures, "became flesh," that he might be "the second Adam," the Surety of the new covenant, to "fulfil all righteousness," and to offer an infinitely valuable atonement for sin, in order that, being risen and ascended, he might be an Advocate and High-priest, and reign over all worlds for the benefit of his church and of mankind. "To save sinners," of every people and character, from condemnation, sin, Satan, the world, and death, even all without exception, who came to him by faith for this salvation, to "the praise of the glory of God," was, and is the only end proposed in this grand and most wonderful transaction. Of these sinners, Paul judged himself "the chief;" the greatest enemy of Christ, and the most deserv- ing of divine vengeance, of all who ever were, or would be, saved by him. (Marg. Ref. k.)—This seems the purport of the expression; but, it is not impossible, that he supposed his actual crimes to be so numerous and enormous, that his guilt even exceeded that of those, who had sinned more entirely against their own convictions, and so had been given up to final impenitency. Instead of imagining, that there was something meritorious in his blind and obstinate sincerity, (as some have maintained in direct opposition to his own statement!) he considered himself as one selected on purpose, because he was more guilty than any other person in the world, (those only excepted, who had committed the unpardonable sin, if even they were excepted,) "that in him first," or the chief sinner, "Jesus Christ might exhibit," with the greatest lustre imaginable, that degree, in which he can bear with and pardon his most violent and enraged enemies, and the most atrociously criminal of mankind. That so it might stand upon record to the end of time, for the encouragement of all others, in every age and nation, who believe in Christ, and rely on his merits and grace, for the pardon of their sins, and the gift of eternal life; to prevent their being bowed down in discouragement by a retrospective view of the number, nature, and heinousness of their crimes. To God, as "the King eternal," in every age and under every dispensation, the universal, and everlasting, invisible Sovereign, the inexhaustible Source of all wisdom, he ascribed all the glory of his conversion, salvation, endowments for service, faithfulness, and usefulness; and he desired earnestly, that God might be honored, in all his perfections and wonderful works, by all rational creatures, for ever and ever Amen. knew of his principles and character; but by entertaining large hopes of him "according to certain prophecies," which inspired persons had uttered concerning him, before his appointment to the ministry; and he expected, that by meditating upon them, he should be animated and instructed, in "warring a good warfare," or rather, "the good warfare;" the truly beneficial and honorable warfare, of a faithful follower and minister of Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. x—a.—Notes, 6:11,12. Eph. 6:10—20. 2 Tim. 2:3—7. 4:6—8.) This must be done, by maintaining and insisting on, fully and clearly, both the faith of the gospel or its doctrines as uncorrupted and unmutated, and a good conscience or a universally conscientious conduct. These Timothy must be careful to connect, both in his own example and in his preaching: for some professed Christians, having neglected to maintain and insist on a good conscience; had, after a time, renounced the faith also, and made shipwreck of their whole religion, either by a total apostasy from their profession, or by heretical corruptions of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) Of this number were Hymeneus and Alexander, with whom Timothy had doubtless been acquainted. (Notes, Acts 19:32—41. 2 Tim. 2:14—19. 4:14,15.) These the apostle had found it needful openly to excommunicate, and cast out of the church, into the visible kingdom of Satan; that they might be instructed by this discipline, "not to blaspheme" Christ, or disgrace his gospel by their impious tenets. It is generally supposed, that some severe correction was miraculously inflicted on them, attending their exclusion from the communion of the church, which would tend to make them sensible of their guilt and danger, and be subservient to the charitable design of bringing them to repentance. (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Notes, 1 Cor. 4:18—21. 5:1—5. 2 Cor. 13:1—4,7—10.) It does not, however, appear, that either of them was thus recovered.—It has often been justly observed, that these severe censures, which the apostle inflicted on those, who had once been professors or ministers of Christianity, and publicly recorded with their names annexed; constitute a most conclusive proof, that he had no dread lest they should be provoked to disclose any secret, or give information of evil practices, which they had witnessed among Christians. His conduct implied a public challenge to them, in this respect; and was the genuine expression of conscientious integrity, and the courage which springs from it.—Some think, that Timothy was chosen to the ministry, by the prophecies respecting him (18); and that this was the way, in which the pastors and teachers in the newly planted churches, were usually selected: but this opinion, as to the general plan, does not appear to be supported by sufficient proof.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Apostles themselves, as well as the most eminent ministers in every age, who have evidently been commissioned by "God our Saviour, and the Lord Jesus Christ," have had no other ground of hope, as to the salvation of their own souls, than what they possessed in common with their meanest brethren. In some respects they have needed, and "do need grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and our Lord Jesus," more than others do: their temptations, trials, and difficulties being greater; having the same evil nature with other men, and no more wisdom or strength, in themselves, than they: and even their most faithful and useful services, needing mercy, in order to the acceptance of them, as well as grace, and sufficiency to perform them. (Note, John 1:16.) He, however, who appointed them, has always been ready to uphold and help them; and his strength is perfected in their weakness. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.)—It is also of the greatest importance, for those to whom such services belong, to charge with all solemnity and authority curious and conceited persons, to "preach no other doctrine" than that of the scriptures: for Satan makes immense use of false teachers, to sow tares in the Lord's field, to multiply hypocrites, to deceive souls, to disturb the peace of the church, to excite questions and contentions; and in short to engage men in any thing, which may take them off from "godly edifying which is in faith."

V. 5—11.

The design of the gospel is not answered by speculation, and solving abstract questions, or "giving heed to fables and endless" disputation: but when sinners, through "repentance towards God and faith towards Christ Jesus," are brought to the habitual exercise of holy "love, out of a pure heart, a good conscience, and faith unfeigned."—All doctrines, sacraments, and forms are just so far beneficial to us, as they are useful in producing this effect in our hearts and lives: and all that faith is dead, which does not thus influence men to love God and each other, in a practical and holy manner. But alas! in how many ways do men swerve from this plain and simple statement of the truth, and "turn aside unto vain jangling!" Many, called Christian ministers, "desire to be teachers of the law, knowing neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm:" and thus a few fragments of morality are substituted, in the place of the holy law, and the blessed "gospel of God our Saviour!" Others know not, or acknowledge not, that the "law is good when used lawfully;" and they declaim in so general a manner against the law and good works, that many conclude the commandments of God to be evil, or void of obligation in themselves, or of authority as the rule of a believer's conduct!—But true Christians derive great benefit from the holy law; and none have any thing to fear from it, but "the lawless and disobedient, the ungodly and profane." We have all indeed deserved condemnation: "there is none righteous, no not one;" except as made so by faith, in Christ, and through his grace; and even those who partake of this blessing, fall far short of that perfect love and obedience which the law demands.—It is allowed, that few in comparison, have been guilty of actual murder, parricide, men-stealing, or perjury; that many are free from the guilt of adultery, and other still baser practices, and even of fornication. Yet, the same corrupt nature is in us all: and our enmity against God, and ingratitude to him: our disposition to disobey and despise parental authority; to hate and quarrel with our neighbors; to please ourselves, regardless of their good and the glory of God; and a variety of polluted thoughts and affections, lying and other vain words, and very many other things "contrary to sound doctrine," would expose us to the wrath of God, and justify him in our final condemnation. Unless therefore, we are "made righteous by faith in Christ," and truly repent, and forsake every sin, we are yet "under the curse of the law," even, "according to the gospel of the blessed God," preached by St. Paul; and at the same time we are unmeet to share the holy felicity of heaven.

It is peculiarly encouraging, to recollect that manner of persons have been converted, pardoned, "counted faithful, put into the ministry," eminently qualified for that sacred service, and made instruments of great good to mankind. Several, who before were "blasphemers, persecutors, and injurious," have, in different ways, been most usefully employed on earth, and are now with holy Paul in heaven; celebrating the rich mercy and grace, by which they were made partakers of repentance, faith, and love; and that precious blood by which they were washed from all their sins. These, in their day, bare witness to that "faithful saying," which we now would earnestly recommend to universal acceptance; even "that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." And it always has been greatly encouraging to trembling penitents, when the preachers of this rich grace were themselves evident and affecting illustrations of their own doctrine; "chief sinners," yet pardoned and changed, sent to declare to others the long-suffering and mercy of Christ to them, "as a pattern to all who should believe on him to everlasting life." Indeed no man, with Paul's example before his eyes, can reasonably question the love and power of Christ to save him, whatever his sins have been; if he really desire and endeavor to trust in him, as the incarnate Son of God, who once died on the cross, and now reigns upon the throne of glory, in order to save "all who come to God through him." (Note, Heb. 7:23—25.) For though some, having obstinately rebelled against the light, are given up to final impenitence; all, who penitently seek salvation by Christ, according to the gospel, are most certainly clear of that sin; having committed their crimes, however atrocious, "in ignorance and unbelief." Let us then seek and hope for this salvation: and, in humble consciousness of our unworthiness, let us admire and praise the grace of "God our Saviour;" and ascribe to "the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, all honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen." (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. 6:1,2.) May all, who are intrusted with the ministry, faithfully and valiantly "war the good warfare," with such weapons, as are "mighty through God," to destroy Satan's strong-holds. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) May they in their doctrine and examples, and may all Christians in their experience and practice, "hold faith and a good conscience." May all, who are tempted to "put away a good conscience," and to pervert the gospel, remember that this is the old way of making shipwreck concerning faith also. And may Hymeneus and Alexander be as beacons, to warn others from these fatal rocks; and as monitors, to "teach them not to blaspheme," and to caution them, "while they think they stand, to take heed lest they fall." (Notes, Ez. 3:20,21. 18:24. 33:12,13. 1 Cor. 10:11,12.)

CHAP. II.

The apostle enjoins prayers, and thanksgivings, to be made for all men; especially for kings and rulers to "God our Saviour, who is willing that all should be saved," 1—4. There is "one God, and one Mediator, Jesus Christ, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," 5, 6. He declares his appointment, as the teacher of the Gentiles, 7; gives directions concerning prayer, and the modest apparel of women, 8—10; prohibits them to teach, and requires them to be in subjection, 11, 12; as the man was first created, and the woman was first seduced into sin, 13, 14. A promise concerning child-bearing, 15.

Note.—Proceeding in his charge to Timothy, the apostle exhorted and enjoined, that "first of all," as a matter of the highest importance, "supplications, prayers, and intercessions," suited to every emergency, and accompanied with thanksgivings for mercies received, should "be made," especially in their public worship; not only in behalf of themselves, each other, and all their fellow Christians; but "for all men," without distinction of nation, rank, or party; and without exception of their enemies and persecutors, from a spirit of genuine and expansive philanthropy. (Marg. Ref.)—The litany of the church of England accordingly beseeches God "to have mercy upon all men;" yet even this scriptural petition has been censured, as inconsistent with submission to the sovereignty of God! But, whatever St. Paul understood by "all men," that we understand by "all men:" if we pray in respect of them at all; and we must pray God "to have mercy on them," unless we mean to imprecate vengeance on them. The command, to "love our neighbor as ourselves," is our rule of conduct, and should dictate our prayers. God will hear our supplications for temporal benefits, or eternal salvation, in behalf of those on whom he sees good in his sovereign wisdom to bestow them: and in other cases, our "prayer will return in to our own bosom." But how can we pray for enemies and persecutors, (whom we cannot possibly know to belong to "the election of grace,") without equally appearing to interfere with God's sovereignty? How can we pray for our children, relatives, or neighbors, or indeed for any unconverted person, or for those whom we are not sure are converted, without violating the same imaginary rule? The malignity of an apostate indeed, may be so excessive, that it would not be proper to pray for him: (Notes, 2 Tim. 4:14,15. 1 John 5:16—18.) but such exceedingly rare exceptions, to a general rule, in no way interfere with our praying even for the salvation of all men, that now are or ever shall live on earth. This is no more than the Lord's prayer teaches us; (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10.) and if there be any individual, for whom we cannot pray, that 'the Lord would 'have mercy on him,' and convert him; the inability must arise from sin, even the sin of not "loving our neighbors as ourselves." Nothing can tend more to perplex theological subjects; to prejudice men's minds against the doctrines of grace, nay, to bring them into odium and contempt; nothing can more narrow and harden the heart against the human species in general; than this method of making the secret decrees of God, in any degree or way, our rule of conduct, instead of adhering to his revealed will. We know not, and cannot know, who are elect, and who are not: we are bound to love all men, to pray for them, and to do them good; and then leave it to God to govern the universe in his sovereign wisdom, justice, and mercy, as he sees good. 2 For <sup>e</sup> kings, and <sup>f</sup> for all that are in * authority; <sup>g</sup> that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in <sup>h</sup> all godliness and honesty.

Note.—It was a proper expression of benevolence, for Christians to pray for all orders and conditions of men; and to interest themselves in the calamities and deliverances of their neighbors, of the community, and of the human species. This would soften the prejudices, and conciliate the favor of those around them; especially when they persevered in such supplications and thanksgivings, notwithstanding the persecutions which they endured. It would likewise conduce very much to silence the accusations of those, who charged them with disaffection to the civil government, and with being troublers of the city, if they not only behaved with quiet subjection to the laws, in all things consistent with their duty, and conscientiously paid tribute and custom; but were also known to pray for "kings, and all in authority" over them, for their preservation, and success in all their lawful undertakings; for the protection and peace of the community, and for all blessings upon their persons and families; and that they opposed no other weapons than these to the injuries which they suffered. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, Ezra 6:6—12. Jer. 29:4—7. Rom. 13:1—7.)—The Ephesians, and others among whom Timothy was called to "do the work of an evangelist," were under the Roman emperor, who was a monster of tyranny and cruelty: the apostle however used the word "kings," in the plural number; whence we learn, that the Holy Spirit intended this direction for other places and ages; according to the different governments established in Providence. (Note, 1 Pet. 2:13—17.) All the kings and rulers on earth were at that time strangers or enemies to Christianity: so that no distinction or exception, in this case, could possibly be intended.—These prayers were to be made, in order that Christians might "lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty," conscientiously attending on all their duties to God and man, without being molested either by public calamities or by persecutions. This object they were to aim at, and with this "quietness and security," to be satisfied. This differs widely from desiring and praying for the success of those enterprises, which serve to aggrandize one country, by the depression and miseries of other countries. These indeed are not lawful undertakings, and we may pray for the peace and welfare of our governors and country, without so much as appearing to favor these measures. The disposition to lead a quiet, peaceable, and pious life, submitting to human authority, as far as consistent with godliness, tends to procure favor to the true worshippers of God; and it may be expected that he will answer their prayers, (so far as good for them,) by inclining their rulers to tolerate, protect, and countenance them.

4 Who <sup>l</sup> will have all men to be saved, and to come unto <sup>m</sup> the knowledge of the truth.

Note.—The conduct above inculcated was "good" in itself, and "acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour;" as a fruit of faith and grace, and honorable to his name. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Note, 1:1.) For as he has provided for the salvation of mankind, without distinction of rank, or nation, or even previous character; and can honorably, and will certainly, save every individual, who comes to him in his appointed way; in this sense, he "willeth that all men should be saved;" (Notes, Ez. 18:23. 33:11. 2 Pet. 3:9.) and it is his good pleasure, nay, his express and repeated command, that we should do all in our power to bring them "to the knowledge of the truth." The gospel should be "preached to every creature;" we are required to assure all whom we can address, that the Lord is able and willing to save any sinner who believes: Christ will say to numbers at the last day, "I called, and ye refused," "I would have gathered you, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Notes, Prov. 1:20—33. Matt. 22:1—10. 23:37—39.)—But as all men do not in fact "come to the knowledge of the truth," which God wills in the same sense as "that all men should be saved;" so the difficulty, if there be any, presses equally on Calvinists and Armenians so called, and even on such as deduce universal actual salvation, from this text and a few similar ones; for they cannot say, "that all men," without exception, actually do "come to the knowledge of the truth." If the clause, therefore, be explained to mean any thing more, than the willingness of God to save all, of every description, who truly believe; and his command, that we should preach to all men, and pray for all men, without distinction; it must follow, that he wills, or purposes, what he does not effect.—It is, however, equally improper to say, with many expositors, that "all men," signifies 'some of all sorts;' because it is obvious to answer, that it may with equal propriety be said, "he willeth that all men should be damned;" for doubtless, some of all nations, ranks, and orders will be left to perish in their sins, "whereunto also they were appointed." 5 For there is <sup>o</sup> one God, <sup>p</sup> and one Mediator, between God and men, <sup>q</sup> the Man Christ Jesus;

Note.—As a further reason, why Christians ought to "pray for all men," the apostle observed, that there was "One God," the common Creator, Benefactor, and Lord of the whole human species: and as all had apostatized from him, and he had purposes of mercy towards them; so there was also "One Mediator between God and men, even the Man Christ Jesus;" which implies, that there is only one Mediator, and excludes the worship of all other intercessors. (Marg. Ref. 9—q.—Notes, 1 Cor. 8:4—6. Eph. 4:1—6. Col. 2:18,19.) Jesus Christ is truly "Man:" and though the efficacy of his mediation is derived from the union of his divine nature with the human, in his mysterious Person; yet that mediation between God and Man, is made by his human nature, in which alone he was capable of obeying, suffering, and dying as their Righteousness, and propitiatory Sacrifice, in order to his resurrection, ascension, and intercession as their High Priest and Advocate with the Father. The apostle designed to excite Christians to intercessory prayers: and he draws one argument for this, from the relation which God himself, and the great Mediator, bear to those, in behalf of whom these supplications should be offered. God, to whom they were to be presented, is the "One God," the Creator of all men; and

"the Mediator" through whom they are presented, is "the Man Christ Jesus," united with us in the bond of one common nature; "bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh." (Note, Heb. 2:14,15.) "One God," in this passage, does not denote the Person of the Father exclusively, but the Deity: the manhood therefore of Christ intervenes between a just and holy God and us sinners; but this Manhood is essentially and inseparably united to the Godhead, in the Person of the Son, who thus mediates between God his Father, and men his brethren.—This provision and appointment has been made and revealed, for the common benefit of the human race, both Jews and Gentiles of every nation; that all who are willing may come in this way, to the mercy-seat of a pardoning God, to seek reconciliation to him. (Notes, 3:16. Is. 55:1—3. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39. Rev. 22:16,17.) This Mediator therefore gave himself "a ransom for all," as "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world;" that, by the all-sufficient atonement of his death upon the cross, and the redemption there made, a foundation might be laid for the hopes of sinners all over the earth, and that all who believe might actually be saved by it. (Notes, John 1:29. 1 John 2:1,2.)—No pious and considerate man will assert, that Christ so gave himself a ransom for all, as actually to intend the salvation of all those who never believe in him; and that he thus failed of his purpose, and suffered in vain. On the other hand, there are but few, even of those who limit such expressions to 'some of all sorts,' who do not allow the all-sufficiency of Christ's atonement; and admit that all men should be invited and commanded to believe in him, and that all who do believe will be saved by him. It is therefore important, far beyond the importance of 'doubtful disputations,' to observe carefully, that none will be saved by the ransom of Christ without true faith; that true faith is "the gift of God," and the effect of regeneration; (Notes, John 1:10—13, v. 13. Eph. 2:4—10.) that "known unto God are all his works, from before the foundation of the world;" and that all will certainly be saved, who were "given unto Christ," and whom he especially intended to save, when he became the Surety of his people. (Note, John 6:36—40.) These propositions are capable of clear scriptural proof: and when they are established, we may safely leave such expressions as that here used, to bear their most obvious import. Indeed, divine wisdom and love are peculiarly shown, in this general way of stating the truths of Christianity; as far more suitable to inquirers and unestablished persons, than a systematical arrangement would be.—This ransom of the Saviour's atoning sacrifice, once offered, was to be "testified in due time," to all men of every nation; it was therefore incumbent upon every Christian, to promote this great design, according to his opportunity and ability: and hence the obligation of sending and supporting missions to every part:

of the heathen world. Of this gospel St. Paul was ordained "a preacher and an apostle;" (in asserting which, he solemnly appealed to Christ, who had appointed him, as his heart-searching Judge, for the exact truth of what he had advanced:) so that he was now employed as "a teacher of the Gentiles" especially, in the doctrines and promises of the gospel, in the nature of faith, and in the faithfulness of God to all his declarations and covenant-engagements, and in every part of his truth and will.

Note.—According to the authority vested in him, the apostle enjoined, that Christians should "pray every where," according to the directions above given. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, 1—4.) The expression may indeed include prayers in the closet, in the family, and in social meetings; but the chapter especially relates to the manner of conducting public assemblies, in what place soever these were held: for "Where two or three are met together, there," says our Saviour, "I am in the midst of you." (Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. 28:19,20. v. 20. Heb. 10:23—25.) "As the apostle is speaking of public prayer, his meaning, I suppose is, that the men, and not the women, 'were to lead the devotion of the assembly (8).' Macknight. The antithesis between the men and the women (9), the word itself, the article, and the connexion, "in like manner," combine in establishing this observation.—The Gentiles had priestesses, as well as priests, not only to their goddesses, but to their gods also: but the Israelites were not allowed to conform to this practice. "In like manner," women must not be ministers, or preachers, under the Christian dispensation.—In order that men might perform the office allotted to them, with acceptance, they must in reverent adoration "lift up holy hands:" not satisfied with washing their hands before they worshipped, according to the custom of the Jews, and indeed that of many Gentiles; but taking care to keep them pure from all injustice, and the practice of every sin. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, Ps. 26:6—8. Heb. 10:19—22.) It was also necessary, that they should avoid all wrath and resentment, either against each other, or against their persecutors; that their prayers and intercessions might be the genuine dictates of enlarged good-will to all men; and not intermingled with angry passions, whatever provocations might be given them. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Matt. 5:23,24. 6:12,14,15. 1 Pet. 3:7.) At the same time, they should not doubt the willingness of God, through Christ, to hear their prayers, notwithstanding all former sins and present conscious unworthiness; or perplex themselves by vain reasonings or disputations, on the manner in which he would answer them. (Notes, Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:22—26. Eph. 3:20,21. Jam. 1:5—8.)—In order to this proper regulation of religious assemblies, as well as the general conduct of Christians; the apostle furthermore enjoined, in the most decided manner, that "the women should adorn themselves with modest apparel," suited to their station in life, and becoming that "bashfulness, and sobriety" of manners, which would be expected from them: not copying the vain fashions of those women, whose attire was intended to render their persons attractive to beholders; and was at once an indication of the levity of their own minds, and suited to excite the passions of others. He required therefore, that they should not adorn themselves with broidered hair, gold, pearls, or expensive garments. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) This general rule may admit of a few exceptions, in the case of those whose superior rank occasionally requires it. (Note, Esth. 5:1—3.) The appearance of women in the places of worship, is especially intended; and the exhortation implied, that whatever garments they wore, they must consider "good works" as their peculiar ornament, as "it became women professing godliness." (Marg. Ref. k, l.) Yet, it doubtless was meant as a general rule, that Christian women should refuse conformity to the foolish fashions of a vain world, in this respect; that they should choose to appear more plain and simple in their attire, than others of their rank; that they should not waste time, or run into

12 But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence.

14 And Adam was not deceived, <sup>o</sup> but the woman being deceived was in the transgression.

Note.—It has been observed, that this rule admitted of an exception, in the case of those, who spoke by the Spirit of prophecy. (Marg. Ref. m.—Note, 1 Cor. 14:34,35.) and it may here be added, that it related to public teaching exclusively, and not to any kind of private instruction, by which no "authority over the man" is implied. The women were required to "be silent with all subjection," in the religious assemblies; by the apostle, as Christ's representative and declaring his will, would not "suffer women to teach," for that would be like "usurping authority over the man;" and therefore their willing subjection was to be shown, by silently receiving instruction. For the man was first created, and the woman of him, and for his benefit: so that it would be contrary to the original state of things at the creation, for the woman to "usurp authority" over the man. (Notes, Gen. 2:18—24. 1 Cor. 11:2—16.) Moreover, the man was not "deceived" in the first instance; but the tempter prevailed against the woman, who was first "in the transgression," and the seducer of the man. (Notes, Gen. 3:1—19.) This humbling consideration was suited to convince the women, that they ought not to affect authority, or presume to be public teachers.

Note.—The sorrows and pains attendant on child-bearing were a peculiar mark of the divine displeasure, against the transgression of the first woman; and suited to bring it to the remembrance of her daughters in every age: yet those who professed the gospel of Christ might be comforted, by the hope of being supported and preserved, through that trying season, and even of deriving benefit from all their sufferings: at least they might be sure, that there was no curse of wrath in it; provided they continued steadfast in the faith, and in love to Christ and his people, with holiness, purity, sobriety, and modesty. (Marg. Ref.)—Some suppose, the apostle to have meant, that, as sin first entered by the woman, whence all the pains and sorrows of child-bearing originated; so, through those sorrows, One had come into the world, "born of a woman," by miraculous conception, without man, by whom all those would be saved, who continued in the faith: and indeed the original may well bear that interpretation, which is also very ancient.—Eve, whom the apostle had just before mentioned, was thus addressed by her offended Creator: "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children:" yet the preceding verse implied a promise of salvation through "the Seed of the woman," for all believers both men and women. (Notes, Gen. 3:14—16.) Eve herself is generally supposed to have been saved "through child-bearing," or, by One descended from her: though the anguish of bearing children was denounced on her, as a peculiar punishment of her atrocious guilt; and thus her sorrow was turned into joy, her curse into a blessing. In like manner, her daughters, though involved with her in the sentence of bringing forth children with sorrow, would also share with her in the same salvation, joy, and blessing, through the promised Seed; if they copied her example of faith and obedience.

In child-bearing.] Δια της τεκνογονιας. Here only. Τεκνογορειω, 5:14. The article favors the latter interpretation.

thanks "for all men," according to the different relations, in which they stand to them; and as their circumstances require. Thus they may show their love to those whom they cannot otherwise serve, and do them a most important benefit; and also evince, that they interest themselves in the happiness of mankind in general. Not only in public, but in our families and closets, we should pray "for kings, and for all that are in authority;" both as guardians of the public tranquillity, and in respect of their temporal and eternal welfare: this will far more conduce to the continuance of our religious privileges, in being allowed without molestation, "to lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty;" than any means which men of restless spirits can employ. But, whatever effect our conduct, in these things, may have on our neighbors; "it is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour." He "hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that he should repent and live." It is his will, that all who repent and believe in Christ should be saved: "he commands all men every where to repent" and "believe the gospel;" it is his will and pleasure, that we should use every means of drawing men's attention to the gospel, that they may "come to the knowledge of the truth." He is the One God of the whole earth, whom all men ought to worship and serve: and, as all have sinned, and deserved wrath, he has appointed "One Mediator between God and man, even the Man Christ Jesus," his incarnate Son, "who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," "that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." May he "ordain" and qualify many preachers, like Paul, "to teach the nations in truth and verity!" For surely we ought to desire, that "men should pray every where," to "God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ," and by the Holy Spirit, "lifting up pure hands, without wrath and doubting." In proportion as we learn thus to "worship in spirit and truth," with awful reverence, holy love, pure zeal, and lively faith; (Note, John 4:21—24.) we shall find our minds freed from narrow prejudices and resentment, and our benevolence towards all men greatly enlarged; and we shall more fervently and intelligently pray to our heavenly Father, saying, "Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven:" "for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen." (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10,13.)

V. 9—15.

Whatever renders the gospel respected in the minds and hearts of those who are without, contributes to its success: and the modest, decent, and sober apparel of "women professing godliness" must therefore have this tendency in no ordinary degree. They should evince, that they are too much engaged in contemplating spiritual glories, to take pleasure in the vain and unseemly decorations of the triflers around them; that being "adorned with good works" is their chief desire, the attainment of their most valued distinction; and that they can make a better use of their time and money, than in curiously adjusting their attire, or purchasing costly ornaments. But alas! in this trifling and expensive age, when almost all vie with their superiors in apparel, till distinction of rank itself is nearly lost; we too often find those, who come to the places where the word of God is preached, decorated as much beyond what they can properly afford, and in as unbecoming a manner, as they who frequent the theatre! It would be well, if the more decided professors of godliness were wholly exempt from this disgraceful vanity: or if they always spent as many hours in visiting the sick and poor, and in labors for their relief, and as much money in relieving their distresses, as they do in uselessly decorating themselves, and their children, after a manner unsuitable to their rank in life, and inconsistent with their profession. These are by no means trifles, or pharisaical impositions, as some affect to call them; but apostolical injunctions: and it should be considered that, as raiment was only made needful by sin; so it is peculiarly unsuitable for those, who profess to believe the Bible, to be proud and vain of the very badge of their disgrace.—The original creation of the man, and then the woman; and the entrance of sin by the woman, who "being deceived was first in the transgression," concur in showing the reasonableness of that subjection, humility, and teachableness, prescribed in scripture to the woman, and the impropriety of her usurping authority over the man. But, as the gospel gives special encouragements to the woman, in respect of those sorrows, which the entrance of sin has entailed on her, provided she continue in faith and love, "with holiness and sobriety;" so the consideration of those manifold sorrows, to which the female sex is subjected, should teach men to exercise their authority with the utmost gentleness, tenderness, and affection. (P. O. Eph. 5:21—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.)

CHAP. III.

"The office of a bishop" is a "good work," and the desire of it, as such, should be encouraged, 1. The qualifications required in bishops and deacons; with directions concerning their wives and children, 2—13. The apostle wrote these things to Timothy, (hoping to come to him soon,) to regulate his conduct in the church of God, "the pillar and ground of the truth," 14, 15. "Great is the mystery of godliness," 16.

Note.—It has already been shown, that the word rendered "bishop," was at this time of the same import with that translated "elder," or presbyter: (Note, Acts 20:17.) for the charge, given by Paul to the Ephesian elders, is here supposed to have been subsequent to the writing of this epistle. The same is also proved, by the silence of the apostle, concerning any other order than bishops and deacons. (Note, Phil. 1:1.) Indeed, it is evident, that the selection or appointment of an individual, to be overseer of the elders or pastors, though very ancient, and probably apostolical, was not at this time in general use. (Note, Rev. 2:1.)—It had been said, and it was a "faithful saying," and worthy of especial notice; that if a man "desired," or earnestly longed for the pastoral office; and, from love to Christ, to his flock, and to the souls of men, was ready to forego other prospects, and expose himself to hardships and perils, by devoting himself to that service; he sought to be employed in "a good work," most important in its nature and object, honorable to the person himself; and more conducive to the glory of God, and the best interests of mankind, than any other employment in the world. His desire therefore ought to be approved and countenanced, provided he were properly qualified. (Marg. Ref. —Note, Jam. 3:1,2.)

Note.—It is manifest, that Timothy was supposed to be principally concerned in the choice of the bishops, being the apostle's deputy and representative; and, accordingly, instructions are here given him, how to fulfil this arduous charge in the proper manner; instructions, no doubt, intended to be useful in the highest degree, if duly regarded, to all others in every age and place, on whom the same most important trust should devolve.—The apostle therefore showed, very particularly, what manner of persons these "bishops" or elders ought to be; in order that mercenary, ambitious, and other improper desires after the sacred service might be repressed; and likewise, that those who had been appointed to it might know how to behave in it. Whatever natural abilities, learning, elocution, or spiritual gifts, any man might possess; he must be considered as ineligible to this office, if not of a "blameless" character, and if he had not avoided scandalous vices, at least since his professed conversion to Christianity.—He ought also to be "the husband of one wife." Christ and the apostles expressly condemned polygamy, as well as divorces except for adultery. (Notes, Matt. 19:3-9. Mark 10:2-12. 1 Cor. 7:1-5.) Yet there was no direct command for a man, who had previously taken more wives than one, to put the others away when he embraced the gospel; and such a requisition, might in some instances have produced very bad consequences in domestic life, and increased the opposition of the civil powers to the preaching of Christianity. But the rule, that no man, however qualified in other respects, should be admitted into the pastoral office, who had more than one wife, or who had put away one to take another, tended to show the unlawfulness of polygamy and divorces on frivolous pretences, and their inconsistency with the Christian dispensation; and concurred with other things to bring them into total disuse in the Christian church, yet without violence and confusion.—To argue hence, as it has been done, that polygamy was lawful for other Christians, else it would not have been needful to restrict pastors from it, would prove, (if it proved any thing,) that it was also lawful and common, for them to be drunkards, covetous, brawlers, or strikers.—Some have inferred from this text, that stated pastors ought to be married, as a pre-requisite to their office; but, this seems to be a mistake of a general permission, connected with a restriction, for an express command. It is, however, abundantly sufficient to prove, that marriage is entirely consistent with the most sacred functions, and the most exemplary holiness; and to subvert the very basis of the antichristian prohibition of marriage to the clergy, with all its concurrent, and consequent, and incalculable mischiefs. (Notes, 4:1-5. Heb. 13:4.)—Yet, some have even endeavored to infer a part of that system from this clause itself, and have supposed that the apostle meant to prohibit second marriages to the clergy! But this is contrary to the whole tenor of scripture; it is by no means contained in the meaning of the words; and would certainly bring in a part of those evils, which long experience has proved inseparable from the general prohibition: for as good reasons may very often be given for marrying a second time, as for marrying at all.—The pastor must also be "vigilant," a circumspect and attentive man; one who watches carefully over his flock, capable of discerning dangers at a distance, guarding the people against the artifices of false teachers and the devices of Satan, and prompt to embrace opportunities of usefulness; he must be "sober," serious, and temperate; moderate in all his desires and indulgences; "of good behavior" in all the transactions of life; showing a meek, kind, equitable, faithful, and prudent disposition towards all men. He should likewise be ready, according to his ability, to relieve the poor, to entertain his brethren without grudging, and with evident cheerfulness and satisfaction; especially, he ought to be hospitable to Christians, who were driven from home by persecution, or who, in any other way, were brought to the place of his residence.—'Now that the ancient customs are changed, and inns are every where open, in which travellers, for their money, may be as well accommodated as in private houses; there is little occasion for what the apostle calls "hospitality." Macknight.—This is a specimen of the way, in which many learned men (some perhaps without intending it,) show, that we have little or nothing to do, either with the practical or doctrinal part of scripture! I should rather, on the other hand, say, 'Now, that ancient customs are changed, and bishops, generally poor in the apostle's time, have ample revenues; they are bound to exercise enlarged hospitality to the poor, especially to the inferior clergy, who often have little of that money, which is needful for accommodation at inns; and who, if hospitably entertained by bishops, would feel cordially reconciled to the affluence of such kind superiors, and disposed to receive their pastoral instructions with reverence.' let me observe in particular, that when young men go for ordination, or ministers for institution, to places where they cannot be accommodated except at an inn; it is incalculable what mischief might be prevented, and what an opening would be made for usefulness, if the bishops would entertain them in their own houses; and take the abundant opportunities, which this would afford, of instructing them respecting the nature and importance of those solemn engagements, into which they are about to enter. The affection and veneration thus excited, in all who are in any degree proper for these sacred services; and the opening thus made for subsequent admonitions and counsels, would repay the expense of it a thousand fold. A bishop must be ready at teaching, both capable of instructing others, and prompt to embrace every occasion of doing it, in public or in private; counting it his business, and making it his delight. 'However we understand the word "bishops," it must be allowed, that they ought to be preachers and teachers, and that frequently and promptly; and not unpreaching prelates.' Latimer.

For if a man were evidently incompetent to govern his own family, and to preserve order and decorum in it; how could it be supposed, that he was qualified to preside over "the church of God," and to preserve order and harmony among the numbers of whom it consisted, who were of various dispositions and situations, and removed a great part of the time from under his immediate inspection. that of the devil.—It is evident from this, that spiritual pride and ambition constituted the beginning of Satan's apostacy. (Marg. Ref.) Some have conjectured, that it was revealed to the angels, that the eternal Son would assume a nature inferior to theirs, in which he would rule over them, and be worshipped by them; and that Satan, and the other angels who fell with him, proudly disdained such subjection. But all our conjectures on this subject must be uncertain, and in a measure presumptuous. The pride, however, and ambition of ministers on account of their office, gifts, popularity, or success, would be of a nature in some respects similar to Satan's pride in heaven, and might involve "the novice" under a similar condemnation.—It is evident, that some exceptions to this most important general rule, must have been admitted, in the first formation of newly planted churches, in which the miraculous gifts and endowments conferred by the Holy Spirit, seem to have superseded the necessity of that previous study and experience, which are, in all ordinary cases, indispensable. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The person elected to this office must also have a good report, an unblemished character, even among his unconverted neighbors; "lest he should fall into reproach," lose his influence, disgrace the gospel, and be ensnared by Satan into the practice of his former evils, and entangled in the world and sin. It would not however be generally advisable, to appoint those to the ministry, whose conduct had been remarkably scandalous; until a competent time had elapsed, to evince the reality of their repentance, and to retrieve and re-establish their characters. (Marg. Ref.)—It is evident, that the apostle did not here at all speak of the several duties of ministers; but only of the general conduct and character of those, whose desires after that office were to be countenanced, or the contrary, by Timothy and by others concerned. Nothing, therefore, can be proved, as some have attempted, from supposed omissions of any duties of ministers, or parts of their office; for this was not the apostle's subject.—Which are without.] *Notes, 1 Cor. 5:9—13. 8 Likewise must <sup>e</sup> the deacons <sup>f</sup> be grave, not <sup>g</sup> double-tongued, <sup>h</sup> not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre;

Note.—The deacons were primarily appointed to dispense the charity of the church, and to manage its secular concerns: yet they preached occasionally, or taught in private, or were readers in the public assemblies; and pastors and evangelists were often chosen from among them. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Acts 6:1—8. 8:5—40.)—Many of the same endowments were requisite in those eligible to this office, as in the pastors or bishops. They too must be "grave," serious, and prudent men; sincere, candid, and consistent in their discourse; not "double-tongued," speaking one thing before men's faces, and another behind their backs; neither flattering, slandering, dissembling, nor prevaricating, in any company, or on any occasion: not "addicted to much wine, or greedy of filthy gain;" which might tempt them, after the example of Judas, to embezzle the money committed to them, or might unfit them for liberally and impartially supplying the wants of the poor. (Note, John 12:1—8.) They must also profess and maintain "the mysteries of the faith, with a pure conscience," and a uniform integrity of conduct; that so they might recommend it to others. It was proper, even in respect of this inferior office, to make trial of new converts; that previous to their admission to it, they might be approved to be men of blameless conversation. The wives also of the deacons (and much more those of the spiritual pastors,) must be of grave and serious deportment; not addicted to the vanities and dissipations of the world; "not slanderers," or prone to circulate disadvantageous reports of their neighbors; but sober women, temperate in all things, and faithful in the discharge of every relative and religious duty. Nor would it be proper for those, who had, previously to their conversion, taken more than one wife, or divorced one for the sake of taking another, to exercise the office of a deacon. It was requisite, that they also should rule their children and domestics, in a regular and exemplary manner. For the faithful discharge of this office would conduce to the increase of their gifts and graces, and to render them very bold in professing the faith. They would be much employed among the poor and sick, and such as were imprisoned for the gospel: and, by thus exposing themselves, and giving counsel and encouragement to their suffering brethren, they would be emboldened and habituated to a promptitude of utterance, which would be "a good degree," or step, towards their admission to the office of pastors or evangelists.—This interpretation has been contested: yet it seems to be the apostle's meaning; and, without adverting to modern habits or controversies, it is evident, that the due discharge of the primitive office of a deacon must tend to qualify men for the ministry. It also appears from facts, that some deacons either were before preachers or became so afterwards; nor is there any reason to think, that persons were then regularly educated for the pastoral office; but ministers seem to have been always chosen from the most established and best qualified believers, and generally from those who were matured in years and experience. This does not, however, in any measure imply, that a regular education is not, in the present state of things, the most expedient and highly desirable.—Be proved. (10) 'By publishing their names to the church; that if any one hath 'ought to lay to their charge, he may show it.' Macknight.—No doubt this was customary in the primitive church, and productive of many good effects: indeed the form of it remains to this day. But it does not appear that the original word can admit of this interpretation; for it generally means, that trial of persons and of things, which is made by experience and observation, or by judging of them by some established standard; as goldsmiths assay the precious metals.—Wives. (11) Some think, that the wives of deacons are not here meant; but women, who were selected and appointed by the church, to teach those young persons of their own sex, who were restrained by local customs, from so attending on the instructions of men, as to obtain from them an adequate acquaintance with Christianity. It is however very doubtful, whether this be the apostle's meaning; and the instruction from the passage, as interpreted of the wives of those who performed any public office in the church, is so replete with instruction, that it seems highly worthy of the special mention made of it by the apostle.

Note.—The apostle hoped, when he wrote this, that he should soon be able to return to Ephesus: but such events subsequently occurred, that probably he never again visited that city, and Timothy, much sooner than had been intended, came to him into Macedonia. (Preface.)—In case, however, the apostle should not see Timothy for some time; he wrote this epistle to show him how he ought to conduct himself, as an evangelist intrusted by him, and by the Lord Jesus himself, to regulate affairs in the family or household of God; even that society of believers, in whom the living God dwelt, as in his holy habitation. (Marg. Ref. z—b.—Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—17. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22. Heb. 12:22—25. 1 Pet. 2: 4—6.) These directions were not peculiar to the state of things among the Ephesians; but would be a rule to Timothy in other churches also, where he might sustain the same office, and perform the same services; and to all others in subsequent ages, who should be employed in a similar manner.—"The church of the living God," by supporting, maintaining, and recommending the truth of revelation, by the public preaching and profession of that truth, and by the worship and service performed in it, may be considered as "the foundation" which upholds the edifice, as a pillar that supports and adorns it. This by no means includes the infallibility of any particular church: but merely implies, that divine truth is upheld, professed, and maintained in the true church: whilst ungodly men in general, and heretics in particular, oppose, pervert, and undermine it; and so error and ignorance envelope all the rest of the world, as with a dark and dreadful cloud. (Marg. Ref. b—f.) Some apply it to Timothy and other faithful ministers: (Gal. 2:9.) but this seems to be only a part of the preceding instruction; for the profession and suitable conversation of believers, as really maintain and recommend the truth, as the minister's labors and doctrines do. (Note, Phil. 2:14—18.)—Others detach the sentence from this verse, and connect it with the following; as if the apostle had meant, that "the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh," was "the pillar and ground of the truth:" but this construction seems inadmissible: for this great mystery is an essential part of the truth, of which "the church is the pillar and ground." And as the church is appointed to maintain, hold forth, and "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," in the midst of a dark and wicked world; it was very important, that Timothy should know how to conduct himself, in subserviency to this great design.

To behave *it*hself. (15) Αραξοφροσθαυ. See on Matt. 17:22. Eph. 2:3.—Ground.] Ἐδουομα. Here only. Ἐδουοσ. See on 1 Cor. 7:37. In the church the truth is stationed, supported, and upheld.

Note.—That "mystery of godliness," which the church must maintain, was confessedly very great. (Note, Matt. 13:10,11.) It never could have been thought of, if it had not been revealed; it could not be received except by faith: and it must be very imperfectly understood by man in his present state, being closely connected with infinite and incomprehensible objects. Some persons might on that account deem it less credible; and others might attempt to obviate the objection, by explaining away the mysteriousness of it: but the apostle declared it to be "beyond controversy a great mystery."—"Great is the mystery of godliness," "God was manifested, &c." It continued a great mystery, after the fullest revelation of it. It must, however, be noted, that it "is the mystery of godliness." (Marg. Ref. h.—Note, 2 Thes. 2:5--7.) The revelation and belief of it have always been and are the beginning and spring of all pious dispositions and affections, in the hearts of fallen men, and of all the spiritual worship of God in the world.—Had this mystery never been revealed, there would not have been any true "godliness" among men; none can be found, where this mystery is unknown or rejected; and "godliness" abounds in proportion, as it is scripturally proposed and received.—By this mystery, men learn the true character of God, as "a just God and a Saviour," and the way in which sinners may approach and worship him; they discover their real situation, their danger, and their remedy; and thus they are brought to fear, trust, love, worship, obey, and rejoice in God. The substance and centre of this great mystery is this, "God was manifest in the flesh:" the divine nature, in the Person of the co-eternal and co-equal Son and Word of God, "was manifested" to fallen men, as dwelling in the man Christ Jesus; so that whoever saw, or contemplated by faith, this express "Image of the invisible God;" saw the Father also. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Is. 7:14. 9:6,7. Matt. 11:27. John 1:1—18. 14:7—14. 15:22—25. Phil. 2:5—11. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:1,2.)—Thus sinners "acquaint themselves with God," and are reconciled to him. This high character Emmanuel claimed, when on earth; and the unmeasurable unction of the Holy Spirit in his human nature, as demonstrated by his perfect holiness and stupendous miracles, justified his claim. But the Jewish priests and rulers put him to death, because he, being man, made himself "God;" (Notes, John 10:32—38. 19:1—7.) and he was "justified" in this, by the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the apostles and disciples, who bare witness to his resurrection and ascension into heaven. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Acts 2:33—36. 3:12—16. 4:5—12. Rom. 1:1—4.) During the whole of these most astonishing events, "he was seen of angels." These "morning-stars, who sang together," when he called the world into existence, (Note, Job 38:4—7.) saw their incarnate Lord laid "a babe in a manger," and sang "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will towards men." (Note, Luke 2:8—14.) They saw him fasting forty days in the wilderness, and tempted by the devil; they witnessed his agonies in the garden; and, in both cases, they were employed to minister unto him. (Notes, Matt. 4:8—11. Luke 22:43.) They saw their incarnate Maker expire, amidst the most cruel indignities, on the cross; with what sensations who can conceive! They witnessed and attended his resurrection and ascension: they now behold his glory, sing his praise, and execute his mandates; and they will at length be his attendants, when he shall come to judge the world. (Marg. Ref. l.—Notes, Matt. 28:1—8. Luke 24:1—9. Acts 1:9—12. Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) In all this, they contemplate with astonishment, delight, and adoration, the infinite wisdom, justice, holiness, truth, and love of God; and "desire to look into these things," as more conspicuous displays of the divine glory, than all his other works had exhibited.—"God manifest in the flesh," had also been "preached to the Gentiles," as their Lord and Saviour, which was a great mystery to the Jewish nation. (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—8. Col. 1:25—27.) And thus he had been "believed on in the world," when the apostle wrote, by many tens and hundreds of thousands of different nations, who, without the Mosaic law, were become the spiritual and accepted worshippers of JEHOVAH: and the case has continued in a great degree the same to this day. This was the effect of his having been "received up into glory," and proved to a demonstration, his exaltation to the mediatorial throne; "all authority in heaven and earth having been given to him," as the Advocate and Intercessor for sinners. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, Matt. 28:18.)—This most important part of scripture seems to have been obscured, and confined in the interpretation given of it, by the attempt of some expositors, to reduce the overflowings of the apostle's fervent spirit to their own ideas of method. But the events referred to cannot be reduced to exact order of time, without evidently doing violence to the meaning of the words.—The construction of the verse necessarily requires, that the first clause should serve as the nominative case to the subsequent verbs.—On the above interpretation the construction is as follows: "God was manifested in the flesh;" "God, manifested in the flesh," was justified by "the Spirit, was seen of angels, &c." But many have labored to establish another reading from some manuscripts, ancient versions, and quotations to this effect: "the mystery of godliness, which was manifested in the flesh." (O, instead of Θεός.) According to this reading, it must follow, "which" mystery "was justified in the Spirit;" which mystery "was seen of angels;" which mystery was "preached unto the Gentiles;" which mystery "was believed in the world;" which mystery "was received up into glory." The mystery being "manifested in the flesh," and "the mystery being received up into glory," are not very intelligible propositions: but numbers seem to prefer absurdity to orthodoxy, especially in respect of the person of Emmanuel. Others, on similar authority, substitute "who." (Oς, for Θεός.) But there is no antecedent to this relative, except "God," in the preceding verse: "The church of the living God, (the pillar, and ground of the truth; and without controversy great is the mystery of godliness,) who was manifested, &c." This brings in the same doctrine, but with a very unnatural parenthesis.—The authority for either of these readings is by no means satisfactory; and the internal evidence for that adopted in our translation is so strong, that it turns the balance completely on that side, in my judgment at least.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The office of a minister is an arduous and laborious, "but a good work," in every respect. It is indeed that most honorable, useful, and important employment, in which Emmanuel himself chose to be occupied; while he refused to assume the office of King, during his abode on earth. They who desire it, therefore, as "a good work," from proper motives, do well; and, if duly qualified, they should be encouraged and assisted in obtaining their object. But to desire emolument or authority in the church, by intruding into this sacred office; without either qualifications suited to its important duties, or any purpose of performing them; from indolence, ambition, and love of "filthy lucre;" is the vilest of all prostitutions, and merits the deepest condemnation. Let then none, who desire this office, or have entered into it, or who have any concern in admitting others, forget that nothing can compensate for the want of proper motives, or a blameless conduct, in those who minister in holy things.—The pastors of the Lord's flock should be continent, vigilant, sober, "of good behavior, given to hospitality, apt to teach," and remote from violent passions, and every kind and degree of covetousness. The more extensive the sphere, and the more conspicuous the station, to which any of them are called; the greater measure of all these holy endowments are requisite: but no man can be a meet person for the pastoral office, in the most obscure situation; who is unwatchful, frivolous, licentious, given to wine, greedy of gain, disposed to furious anger, negligent of moral and relative duties, selfish, averse to hospitality, and unable or unwilling to teach the flock. It would be invidious to contrast this description with the characters of very large numbers who have sustained the ministerial office, in different ages and parts of the visible church, and still do sustain it. No order of men fulfil the duties of their station: but alas! none have violated them so generally and grievously as nominal ministers. It, however, behoves us "to look to ourselves," and to those with whom we are concerned. We, who bear this office, should "pray without ceasing," to be enabled more fully to transcribe these words of the apostle into our hearts and lives: and the people should learn to distinguish mercenaries from upright disinterested ministers. They should indeed make allowance for human infirmities, which are incident to all: they should help their ministers by their prayers: blessing God for such as are faithful, and earnestly and with much perseverance supplicating converting grace for such as are evidently the reverse of what they ought to be.—It is incumbent upon ministers to "rule well their own houses, and to have their children in subjection with all gravity." (Note, Gen. 18:18,19.) If they find this too difficult for them, "how shall they take care of the church of God?" The folly, ostentation, conformity to the world, extravagance or ungodliness of a minister's family will inevitably and greatly lessen his influence, and prevent his usefulness, as well as ruin his comfort. It is also very wrong for novices, however eminent for abilities and gifts, to be pushed forward prematurely into this arduous work. This has ruined many promising young men, by puffing them up with pride, and so casting them into "the condemnation of the devil." The honor of the gospel also is greatly concerned in "the good report" of ministers, among "those that are without." And Satan finds various advantages against such as lose their reputation, and incur the reproach of the enemies of the gospel; and not only against them, but against the cause of truth and holiness.

V. 8—16.

Not only bishops and elders, but all concerned in "the church of the living God," should be grave, sincere, upright, candid, temperate, and disinterested; those especially to whom money is intrusted, and who have the charge of relieving the poor: for to rob them is one of the very worst kinds of dishonesty. (Notes, Prov. 22:22,23. 23:10,11. Am. 5:10—13. 8:4—10. Mic. 3:1—4.) The "mystery of faith" will never appear respectable among men, except it be held in "a pure conscience." Professed Christians should therefore be proved, and found blameless, before they are admitted to any office in the church. Time spent in preparation and probation will not be lost; and a precipitate zeal is not one of the prescribed qualifications for the ministry.—All who are connected with persons in public stations in the church, should be exemplary in their whole appearance and deportment. The wives of ministers and deacons should be “grave and sober, no slanderers, but faithful in all things.” They should choose such wives; and their wives should be reminded to study and practise these instructions; and to assist and concur in ruling their children and households well.—Those who have acted faithfully and diligently in inferior stations, are best qualified for more important services; especially when by enduring hardship and facing danger, they have “attained to great boldness in the faith of Christ.” These things should be frequently meditated upon, and prayed over, by all persons concerned; that they may know “how they ought to behave in the church of the living God;” (Note, Acts 20:28.) according to the relations in which they stand to him, to his saints, and to the world; that they may hold forth and adorn the doctrine of truth, as pillars and supporters of it. This “doctrine of God our Saviour” will be despised or revered, in great measure according to the conduct of professors of the gospel; which will be greatly influenced by that of ministers, their families and connexions. (Note, Tit. 2:7—10.) The importance of these things is therefore unspeakable; and our watchfulness ought to correspond with it.—While numbers want a religion “without mystery,” (which those who worship the incomprehensible God cannot possibly have,) and while many seem to make the very truths of the gospel “a mystery of ungodliness;” let us glory in the incontrovertibly “great mystery of godliness,” and show the sanctifying efficacy of it in our lives. Let us remember that “God was manifested in the flesh,” to take away our sins; “to destroy the works of the devil; to redeem us from all iniquity, and to purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works;” and let us recollect, that the doctrine of his mysterious Person and redemption must be “justified” by the fruits of the Spirit, evidently appearing in our lives. Let us learn to contemplate his antecedent glory, his voluntary humiliation, his subsequent exaltation, and his future coming to judgment, till we hate sin, despise the world, are transformed into his image, filled with his love, and prepared to join the worship of his holy angels: and let us still pray, that he may be preached to all the nations on earth, and believed on in all parts of the world; and so let us wait till he shall please to receive us up to his glory, that “where he is, there we may be also.”

The apostle foretels a great apostacy, and corruption of Christianity, in after times, 1—3; shows that “every creature of God is good” and to be received with thanksgiving and prayer, 4, 5; and directs Timothy, in respect of his doctrine and personal conduct, that he may preach and live in such a manner as “to save himself and those that hear him,” 6—16.

Note.—To stir up Timothy, and others by him, to adhere steadfastly to the “great mystery of godliness,” (Note, 3:16.) the apostle declared, that the Holy Spirit spake, in the most express and decisive manner, not only by Daniel, and others of the ancient prophets, but to Paul himself by immediate revelation, and perhaps to several of his brethren, concerning certain persons in the latter days, under the Christian dispensation, or in after times, who would apostatize from the true faith of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. a. c. d.—Notes, Dan. 7:7,8,19—27. 11:31—39. 2 Thes. 2:3,4. 2 Tim. 3:1—5. Rev. 13:14.) This apostacy would be effected, by men’s hearkening to false teachers, who would be influenced by seducing spirits; and thus they would embrace “doctrines of devils,” or demons; and adopt such notions about the souls of the dead, as would introduce the worship of saints as intercessors, and of angels as spirits superior to men, though inferior to God. This was a species of idolatry, like that of the heathen, in worshipping their departed monarchs, legislators, and benefactors, as “demons,” or a middle order of beings between God and men. And, as devils are the real objects of all worship paid to mere creatures, so this delusion would tend to gratify the ambition of these apostate spirits. (Marg. Ref. e. f.—Notes, 1 Cor. 10:18—22. Col. 2:18,19.) These doctrines and practices would be supported “by the hypocrisy of liars,” who would invent a variety of legends, impose on men with pretended miracles and revelations, cheat them by fabricated tales; and thus carry on an infamous traffic, for forgery and imposture, under the pretex of great sanctity, to the aggrandizing of themselves, and the deluding of the credulous multitude. (Marg. Ref. g.—Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) Nor would these men feel remorse, for their lies and forgeries, however impious and destructive: as the habit of villainy, under the mask of extraordinary piety, would cauterize their consciences, and render them entirely callous; even as the external skin becomes unfeeling, by being frequently “seared with a hot iron.” To maintain their usurpations over men’s minds, and to fix a large body in their interest by detaching them from other connexions; as well as to amuse mankind by the appearance of uncommon sanctity; they would discourage and even forbid marriage, as if it were an unholy estate and unfit for devout persons: they would deny the liberty of marrying to numbers, especially to the clergy; by means of which, all kind of abominations would be introduced, and connived at. (Note, 3:2.) They would also enjoin abstinence from this and the other kind of meat, either entirely, or on particular days and seasons: by this likewise they would keep up their authority over men’s consciences, and impose upon the multitude with apparent devotion; whilst they perpetrated all kind of iniquities, as the Pharisees had done before them. (Marg. Ref. b—k.—Notes, Matt. 15:1—14. 23.)—But God had created every kind of wholesome food for the benefit of man, and allowed Christians the use of it all, indiscriminately, at all times and seasons, without restriction: and therefore any of his creatures might be “received with thanksgiving by those who believed the truth,” and so far understood it as to know their Christian liberty. (Notes, Rom. 14:2—4, 13—18.) For, all his creatures, being in themselves good, and serving the purposes for which he made them, nothing was to be refused as unclean, provided it was received with thankfulness: as the permission of his word, a temperate use of it, according to his precepts, and prayer for a blessing upon it, sanctified it to the believer’s use, and to fit him for the Lord’s service. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Note, 1 Cor. 7:10—14.)—Every one, who is at all acquainted with ecclesiastical history, must know what apostacy and corruption of Christianity has most entirely accorded to this prediction. The Judaizing teachers and the Gnostics, and others, contended indeed for some of these superstitions; “the mystery of iniquity,” in these respects did “even then work;” but it was reserved for the church of Rome fully to prove the truth of the scriptures, by accomplishing these predictions in their most detestable enormities. It has been shown, in what manner the errors of the Judaizing teachers, and the traditions of the Pharisees, on the one hand, and the speculations of the heathen philosophers, on the other, corrupted the pure doctrine of Christianity in the primitive times. (Notes, Col. 2:8—23.) But, it should not be forgotten, that in subsequent ages, especially in the Roman church, the mythology of the Pagans, and the writings of the poets, helped to introduce still further corruptions. For what are the nuns of popery, but the vestal virgins of the Romans, engrafted on Christianity? The monks indeed are an unprecedented addition. Saints and angels, as mediators, answer to the demigods and heroes of the Pagans; (Note, 1 Cor. 8:4—6.) and the numerous processions and festivals of the papists, and the method of observing them, answer with surprising exactness, to those described in Homer and Virgil, especially in the latter. Indeed, it appears to me, that a learned man, who had leisure to compare all the pompous and fascinating outward services in the church of Rome especially, though not there exclusively, with the Greek and Latin poets, might form, I had almost said, a Rubric and a ritual from the latter. At least, I have never, for many years, opened Virgil to read a few pages; but I have met with some things, which cogently reminded me of the popish processions and festivals.—“The third verse contains one of the boldest ellipses in the New Testament, where a word is to be understood, contrary to that which is before expressed: but, some of the most celebrated classical writers, and particularly Horace and Cicero, take the same liberty.” Doddridge. The passage undeniably demands this construction; and all the ancient expositions and versions supply the ellipsis in the same manner, or to the same meaning. (Note, Acts 15:19—21.)—Latter times. (1) (Marg. Ref. c.—Devils.) This term, thus used, proves that the worship of saints and angels, as mediators, in the antichristian system, is as much idolatry, and centres as much in the worship of evil spirits, as the pagan worship did; and that it was introduced, and is maintained, by the seduction of “the devil and his angels,” even as heathen idolatry was.

10 For <sup>f</sup> therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, <sup>g</sup> because we trust in <sup>h</sup> the living God, who is <sup>i</sup> the Saviour of all men, <sup>k</sup> specially of those that believe.

Note.—Timothy was directed to attend to the foregoing precautions himself; and also "to put his brethren in remembrance" of them, that they might be upon their guard against every specious delusion. Thus he would be "a good minister of Christ;" and act as it became one, who had been fully instructed "in the words of faith and of good doctrine," and who had digested them well, and turned them into spiritual nourishment: for he had been trained up in these things, was diligently studying them, and indeed had made great proficiency. (Marg. Ref. s—y.—Notes, 2 Tim. 1:3—5. 2:14—18. 3:10—12, 14—17.) But he ought steadily to reject the impious fables and foolish traditions of the Jewish deceivers, and of others who perverted the gospel; which were no better than the stories, with which the weakest and most ignorant of women, when almost superannuated, used to amuse children. He ought, therefore, to treat such impertinences with the neglect which they merited, and to exercise himself, by daily study, meditation, and practice, in every part of "godliness;" as consisting of a right state of mind and heart, and consistent conduct of life, towards God; and as attained by sinners, through the believing contemplation of "the great mystery of godliness," and by faith in the divine Saviour. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, 3:16. Tit. 2:11, 12.) In this he must make daily progress himself, and this he ought to inculcate on others. For no diligence in mere externals, however laborious, self-denying, or exact, could be of great use to any man. Even the Mosaic ceremonies had but little profited the Israelites in general, and in no degree those who depended on them; nor could they avail the Jewish Christians: and all human inventions and observances must in all cases be far more unprofitable and vain. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Matt. 15:1—11. 23:1—7. Luke 11:37—40. Acts 15:7—11. Gal. 3:6—14. Col. 2:20—23.) But "godliness," according to the principles and rules of the gospel, "is profitable unto all things;" and is abundantly advantageous to the man himself, to his connexions, the church, and society. The promises of temporal prosperity to Israel, as annexed to their national obedience, were indeed no longer in force; and godliness might expose a Christian to many outward losses and persecutions; (Note, 2 Tim. 3:10—12.) nor were any promises of wealth, prosperity, or long life given by the gospel: yet, the new covenant engaged to bestow on believers such spiritual peace, and such abundant supports and consolations, and they were under such a peculiar care and protection of Providence, that godliness might well be said to have "the promise both of this life, and of that which is to come." (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, 6:6—10, vv. 6—8. Ps. 84:11, 12. Matt. 6:33, 34.) This was therefore to be considered as "a faithful saying, and worthy of universal acceptation:" (Note, 1:15, 16.) for in dependence on these promises, in experience of their accomplishment, and in promoting godliness among mankind, the apostle and his brethren both labored without wearying, and suffered reproach without fainting: because they "trusted in the living God," who is "the Preserver of all men," in respect of their lives and temporal concerns; and who will therefore take especial care of believers, as interested in his covenanted blessings. Or, who is the Saviour of sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, and of mankind in general; so that none are rejected when they seek to him for salvation; of which believers are already made partakers by his special grace. (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Notes, John 1:29. 1 John 4:9—17.)—Do they, who seem dissatisfied with this interpretation, (as some are,) really intend to maintain, that all men without exception will eventually be saved? The author of the book De Vocacione Gentium expounds this very well, telling us, that by saying ... "He is the Saviour of all men," he confirms the general goodness of God towards all men; and by adding, "specially of them that believe," he shows, there is one part of mankind, who through the benefit of divinely inspired faith, is by special benefits advanced to the highest and eternal felicity. Whitby.

Note.—Timothy was here required solemnly to charge, and enforce on the consciences of the pastors and people, the practice of all those things, in which true godliness consists; and to teach them the nature, obligation, motives, and encouragements of it. (Marg. Ref. l.) As he was younger than men generally were, to whom services of so high importance were allotted, and probably than several of the elders at Ephesus; it would be peculiarly incumbent upon him to act with that peculiar sedateness and wisdom, which might exclude every one from the least pretence of despising his person or admonitions, on that account. (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, 1 Cor. 16:10,11. Tit. 2:15.) It behoved him, therefore, to be “an example” to the whole company of believers, by a steadfast and consistent adherence to the word of the gospel, in his profession and preaching; by a pious, pure, and edifying “conversation” and habitual conduct; by “love” to the Lord, his people, and all men; by spirituality, and all the fruits of the Holy Spirit; by a lively exercise of faith in the mercy, promise, and providence of God, amidst all hardships and perils; and by purity, avoiding whatever might excite suspicion, in respect of those youthful lusts, by which so many were contaminated. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.) “Till the apostle came to him,” which he then hoped to do, though it turned out otherwise, (Note, 3:14,15.) let him devote a part of his time to the study of the scriptures, or of any other books which could add to his fund of profitable knowledge; and to exhorting and instructing the people in sound doctrine. (Marg. Ref. p—s.) As he had been endued with excellent gifts, which were conferred upon him, according to the prophecies of inspired men respecting him, when he was solemnly ordained to be a minister and an evangelist, by the imposition of the hands of the elders, as well as those of the apostle; let him not neglect to exercise and improve those gifts: for some who received them afterwards became negligent, or made a bad use of them; nay, perhaps, were deprived of them on that account. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, 1 Cor. 14:)—Or, the ministerial office itself may be intended. (Notes, Eph. 3: 1—8.) Let him therefore assiduously and carefully “meditate on those things,” and well consider the various important duties, to which he was called. Let him “give himself wholly to them,” or be “entirely in them,” making them the one great business and pleasure of his life, and cordially devoting all his time and abilities to this important service: (Note, Phil. 1:21—26.) that his growth in wisdom, in ministerial endowments, and in holiness, might be manifest to all around him. (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, 6:20,21. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 4:1—5.) He was indeed placed amidst various snares and difficulties, and had the same deceitful heart as other men had: he ought, therefore, to take special “heed unto himself;” to the state of his soul, his own growth in grace; to his motives, temper, and conduct in every particular. He was also required to look well to his “doctrine,” that it was scriptural, evangelical, and practical; well-stated, explained, defended, and applied: placing every part in due proportion and connexion, to form one perfect whole; and thus “declaring the whole counsel of God.” (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) And, whatever trials or discouragements he might meet with, let him persevere steadfastly in this course; and he would thus ensure his own salvation, help forward that of other believers, and be the instrument of conversion and eternal salvation to many of those who attended on his ministry. (Marg. Ref. b—f.—Notes, Ez. 3:17—21. 33: 11—13. Acts 20:18—31.)

and various dire corruptions into the church, "turn to a testimony," to every humble believer; who, reading that "the Spirit spoke expressly," of these things long before, is thus most fully convinced of the divine authority of the sacred oracles.—Those who allow themselves "to speak lies in hypocrisy," for their secular purposes and interests, will gradually become callous in impiety and iniquity, as if "their consciences were seared with a hot iron;" and no desperate infidels or profligates become so destitute of all feeling and remorse, as the sanctified impostor; nor ought we to deem any enormity incredible, when properly authenticated, as committed by men of this description.—Those false teachers, who most neglect the commandments of God, and allow themselves and others in the most atrocious violations of moral and relative duties, are generally very prompt to forbid as evil, what God has pronounced innocent and honorable; and to command as a duty what he has left indifferent. But "the law of the Lord" is "exceedingly broad;" and we shall find abundant exercise for watchfulness, diligence, self-denial, and mortification of the flesh, in attending to its holy requirements; without being laid under further restrictions, or tasked to imaginary duties: as if we had at present done all his will, and wanted more employment! We should, therefore, be upon our guard against impositions of this kind, on whatever pretence they are enforced: and, while we follow after purity, and exercise temperance in all things, according to the will of God; let us disregard such as judge us in those things which he has allowed.—While we are satisfied, that "every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused;" let us remember, that all should be "received with thanksgiving, by them who believe and know the truth;" that even the divine allowance will not sanctify an intemperate, inexpedient, extravagant, unthankful, or cruel use of the creatures; and that nothing will be good to us, except we seek, by prayer, the Lord's blessing on our use of it.

V. 6—16.

They, who would approve themselves to be faithful ministers, must "put the brethren in remembrance" of all those things, which Christ and his apostles delivered to the church; and, whatever other studies or accomplishments may be supposed requisite, in those intended for the ministry; it is above all, necessary, that they "be nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine;" and that they well digest that knowledge of the scripture to which they have attained.—Instead of amusing ourselves and others, with ingenious fancies and curious speculations; or with enforcing human inventions and superstitions, by imaginary or fallacious explanations of their origin, meaning, and benefit, which are often no better than "profane and old wives' fables;" we should exercise ourselves and instruct others, in the substantial duties of godliness. This has at all times the promise both of this world and of the next; and our present solid satisfaction (as well as our eternal happiness) is inseparably connected with it; but all else is "vanity and vexation of spirit." "This faithful saying is worthy of universal acceptance:" apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, both "labored, endured reproach," and faced death in all its terrors, in support of it; because "they trusted in the living God;" who, being "the Preserver of all men," and "the Saviour of the world," will surely take especial care of those who believe, and cause all things to work together for their eternal good. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 8:28—31.)—It behoves all, who "command and teach" these things, to take heed, that "no man despise them;" but this is especially incumbent on young ministers, when called into conspicuous situations; who should be doubly careful to "abstain from all appearance of evil;" and to shun all levity of conduct, as well as whatever is more directly criminal, or leads to criminality. For they will be narrowly observed, and many will be ready to deem them unfit for their arduous services; especially when they are called to instruct or to admonish their seniors and superiors. Ministers should also be careful to confirm and elucidate their instructions by their example; and thus to lead forward believers to steadfastness in the faith, holiness of conversation and conduct, fervent love, spirituality, fidelity, integrity, and purity. Their time should be employed in reading and meditating on the scriptures; in acquiring religious knowledge; and in communicating it, by the public and private duties of their ministry. This will leave them no leisure for dissipated pleasures, trifling visits, or idle conversation; and but little for amusing and merely ornamental studies. That measure of endowment, which God has given them for the work, to which they have been set apart, and to which they solemnly devoted themselves, when ordained by "the laying on of the hands of the" pastors of the church, must not be neglected, or left to decrease by disuse, but be diligently exercised and improved.—Alas! we cannot but reflect with grief of heart, that so few of those called ministers seem so much as to have ever seriously read these directions! and that their method of spending their time, the subjects of their studies, the objects of their pursuits, and the business and pleasure of their lives, form a perfect contrast to what they ought to be. But, may the Lord have mercy upon each of us, and write these admonitions in our inmost souls! May we "meditate" continually "on them!" May our thoughts and affections be engrossed by them! May we "give ourselves wholly unto them, that our profiting may appear unto all men!" Let every minister, then, hear the apostle call upon him to "take heed to himself," as one who must give account; to look to it, that he experience the power of the gospel in his own soul, and bring forth the fruits of it in his life; that his motives, tempers, words, and works, be pure and evangelical; that his doctrine be scriptural; that he "declare the whole counsel of God," and that he "manifest the truth to every man's conscience, as in the sight" of his heart-searching Judge. And let every one, who has thus begun his ministry, persevere in this holy living and faithful preaching; however despised, reviled, opposed, or discouraged he may be: for in so doing, he shall both "save his own soul," and those of his attentive hearers: while dumb and greedy dogs, blind watchmen or guides, mercenary teachers, and gay triflers in the garb of Christian ministers, in short all those "who look every one for his gain from his quarter." however otherwise distinguished by rank, nobility, learning, or eloquence, can have no reason to expect any other event of their conduct, than that of going before their deluded followers, into the pit of everlasting destruction. (Note and P. O. Is. 56: 9—12.)

Note.—The connexion of the word translated “an elder,” in this place, has induced expositors in general to understand it of senior Christians, as well as of pastors. It must, likewise, be supposed that the apostle spoke of such faults, as resulted from infirmity, and were not openly scandalous: or the counsel would seem inconsistent with a subsequent injunction. (Note, 19, 20.)—As Timothy was young, it was peculiarly incumbent on him to avoid harshness, in animadverting on the misconduct of aged ministers or Christians: he ought not therefore to rebuke them with severity, or in apparent anger; but to “entreat them” to act with greater circumspection, and endeavor modestly to convince them of the impropriety and bad effects of the mistakes into which they had been betrayed: even as a son, placed in authority, would address an honored parent, who had not acted with due regard to his character and situation. In reproving young men or ministers, it would be proper to speak with great meekness and affection, and to admonish them “as brethren.” The elder women he must counsel and caution, as dutiful sons in such stations would their mothers; and he should behave towards the younger women with that kind of regard and affection, which is borne to sisters; and “with all purity,” that nothing contrary to the strictest decorum might attend his ministerial converse with them.

Note.—The apostle next directed, that the aged widows, who were really destitute, should be honorably provided for. But if any widow had “children, or grand-children,” who were capable of relieving her; they ought to be required, as a duty of the first importance, to “show piety,” or a respectful and grateful affection “at home;” requiring the tender, laborious, and expensive care of their parents towards them, in infancy and childhood, by providing for them in old age: for that was good in itself, a debt due to them, and an acceptable service to God, even in preference to any other charitable work. Note.—The “widow indeed,” whom the apostle peculiarly intended, was one who was “desolate,” having neither children nor relations able to maintain her; being destitute of the means of procuring a decent subsistence: at the same time “she trusted in God” to provide for her, and used no improper methods of obtaining a support: but devoted herself to his service, in continual prayers and supplications, stated and occasional, public and private, and 8 But if any provide not for his own, <sup>x</sup> and specially for those of his own * house, <sup>y</sup> he hath denied the faith, <sup>z</sup> and is worse than an infidel.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The things above stated Timothy must give in charge to the pastors and deacons; that the Christians at Ephesus, might be preserved ‘blameless;’ and that no encouragement might be given, even by means of their benevolence, to such persons as were a scandal to the cause.—But if any man refused to provide for his own near relations, especially for his wife, children, and household; or for his aged parents; through sloth, covetousness, extravagance, or self-indulgence; he should be considered as having renounced the faith, by manifestly and habitually refusing to obey Christ; nay, as acting in this particular more disgracefully and unreasonably, than an unbeliever would do in similar circumstances.—The heathen in general considered children as bound to support their aged parents; and reckoned the neglect of this duty infamous, and fit only to be mentioned along with the most scandalous vices.—The manner in which many covetous persons grievously pervert this text, must not pass unnoticed: while they evidently violate the duties of piety, equity, and charity, as well as that of providing for their indigent relations; yea, while they bring up their children and maintain their families, in a manner utterly unsuitable to their circumstances, from eagerness to amass riches; they often quote this verse, in vindication of their sordid avarice; and imagine, that the apostle commanded men to neglect all other duties, in order to enrich their children! (Note, 16.)—‘Pleading these words, ‘to justify or to excuse their sordid parsimony, ‘and want of charity: ... whereas, they plainly ‘respect the provision which children should ‘make for their parents; and not that which parents should make for their children.’ Whitby.

Note.—The apostle could not here mean, that no widows were to be relieved by the church, who were under sixty years of age: for the distresses of younger widows, as well as of other poor persons, might be very urgent.—He is, therefore, generally supposed to speak of a certain number of widows, who were discharged from all secular cares, and maintained by the church; of whom such as were able acted as deaconesses, to visit sick and poor women, and to administer relief and counsel to them; to instruct young women, and perhaps children; or to attend on any other concerns of the church, its ministers, and pious strangers, which lay within their province. Though no command is given for such an order of persons in the church; (for many things of this kind seem to have been left discretionary, and to be determined according to circumstances;) yet they might frequently be useful, if properly selected and regulated. (Note, Rom. 16:1,2.) In this view the propriety of the rule here given is apparent. As the apostle counsels ‘the younger widows to marry;’ (Note, 13—15.) It cannot be imagined, that he would exclude any when grown old, from the number here intended, if otherwise qualified, merely because they had followed his counsel. By ‘the wife of one man,’ therefore, the apostle did not intend to exclude such as had married a second time, which the scripture no where disallows, or at all discourages. But shameful and astonishing irregularities, in this respect, were common among the heathen women: they frequently left their husbands to live with other men, and then sometimes returned again to their former husbands; they often, designedly, gave them just cause to divorce them, on purpose that they might take other husbands; nay, they sometimes did what was equivalent to divorcing their husbands: nor were these things deemed scandalous; at least not in that degree, which they would be at present, in countries professing Christianity. If then, any woman had formerly conformed to these corrupt customs, it would not be consistent with the credit of Christianity, to admit her into this select number of devoted widows, though no other objection lay against her; for it must exclusively consist of those, who had lived virtuously and honorably in the married state. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Note, 3:2.)—Some expositors indeed think, that those who had married again, after being divorced, were intended: but there is not the least intimation in scripture, that the divorced should be restrained from marrying again, even if justly put away; and surely then not when unjustly divorced.—The women, however, spoken of, must also be such as had an established character for “good works” since they were converted to Christianity. Those were to be preferred, who had charitably educated the children of their poor relatives or neighbors, or who had faithfully done their duty towards their own children; who, when in more prosperous circumstances, had hospitably entertained strangers in their houses; who had willingly stooped to the office of washing the feet of the sainted, when wearied with travelling; (Notes, Gen. 18:3—8. Luke 7:44—50. John 13:1—17.) and who had, from love to Christ, readily relieved the afflicted, and diligently “attended to every good work.” (Marg. Ref. d—k.—Note and P. O. Acts 9:36—43.) Widows of this character, when grown old and left desolate, were the proper persons for this service.—But the apostle directed Timothy to reject the application of “younger widows:” for experience showed, that their avowed purpose, of no more entering into the married state, was not to be depended on. After a time, when their grief on account of their loss had subsided, various circumstances might induce them to marry again: and, as their admission into the number of devoted widows implied an engagement to the contrary, and probably was attended by some promise to this effect; so their violation of it might be called “a waxing wanton against Christ,” leading them to be unfaithful to him, for the sake of some earthly object. Thus their engagement would tend to their condemnation, by occasioning them to violate that fidelity to Christ, which they had previously promised: the church would see it necessary to censure them; and their sin would expose them to condemnation if not repented of. They might perhaps be tempted to apostatize from the faith, by marrying heathens; which seems to have been the case with some of this description. For Christians would not be disposed to marry those who had entered into this number; and if their inclinations led them to marry, their situation might expose them peculiarly to this temptation.

Note.—It might likewise be feared, and experience had shown, that there was danger, lest “younger widows,” being freed from the employments of domestic life, and having much leisure, should neglect to spend it in devotion, and the duties of their station; and so contract habits of idleness, and waste their hours in sauntering from house to house, as trifling visitants; tattling and gossiping about the news of the day, and intermeddling with other people’s affairs, spreading slanders, and speaking many things of a mischievous and improper nature. (Marg. Ref. q—t.—Note, 2 Thes. 3: 10—12.) The apostle did not mean, that all “the younger widows,” who were employed in this service, acted in this manner: but it was an evil incident to the practice, and formed a sufficient reason for excluding them. He therefore decided, as one having authority, that it was better to leave them at liberty to marry, if they chose it, and circumstances admitted, that they might be occupied in the useful duties of wives and mothers, and in domestic business: that so no occasion might be given to any adversaries of the gospel to speak reproachfully of it, through the misconduct of such as professed to be peculiarly devoted to the service of Christ. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) For indeed, some younger widows, being improperly admitted into this number, had turned aside to follow the suggestions of Satan, had married unbelieving husbands, and so relapsed into idolatry.—“The converting men to the Christian faith, ‘being the “turning them from Satan unto God;” ... the casting off the faith may well ‘be styled, “the turning aside after Satan.”’ Whitby. (Marg. Ref. a.—Note, Acts 26:16—18.)—The apostle’s determination, that no widow under sixty years of age should be admitted into this select number of devoted women, lest their useless lives and misconduct should occasion scandal, and his counsel that younger widows should marry, conclude with peculiar force against all vows of virginity, taken by young persons, under pretence of more strict religion than can be practised in the married state, and against all censures of second marriages, as such: and, indeed, the silence of the apostle concerning women, who had never been married, in this whole argument, is very expressive. 16 If any man or woman that believeth have widows, <sup>b</sup> let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged; that it may relieve them that are <sup>c</sup> widows indeed.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—In closing this subject, the apostle required all believers, men and women, who were able, to relieve widows belonging to their own families, and others who were destitute; that the church might not be burdened with them, or prevented from relieving such as were entirely indigent and friendless. (Notes, 3—8.)—In the opinion of Estius, this precept extended to the proprietors of slaves; and bound them ‘to maintain their slaves, when they became ‘incapable of labor.’ Macknight. The spirit of it, no doubt, extends to servants of every kind, who have spent their strength in our service, as far as we are able to support them. 17 Let <sup>d</sup> the elders that <sup>e</sup> rule well <sup>f</sup> be counted worthy of <sup>g</sup> double honor, especially they who <sup>h</sup> labor in the <sup>i</sup> word and doctrine.

18 For <sup>k</sup> the scripture saith, <sup>l</sup> Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn; and, <sup>m</sup> The laborer is worthy of his reward.

Note.—Many expositors infer from these verses, that there were ‘ruling elders’ in the church, who did not preach; but others do not allow the inference; and, in general, ruling and teaching are united. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, 3; 2,4,5. Matt. 24:45—51. 1 Thes. 5:12—15. Heb.

13:7,8,17.) Indeed, as “double honor” chiefly relates to a more plentiful and decent maintenance; it is improbable, that mere rulers, who would not be greatly taken off from their secular business, should be thus liberally maintained at the expense of their brethren. To preside in the affairs of the church, and to preach the word, even the doctrine of Christ, constitute the outlines of the pastoral office: the direction seems therefore to mean, that those who ruled most prudently, faithfully, and diligently, and were most laborious in their ministry, should be respected and provided for, more honorably and plentifully: especially they, who were most unwearied in preaching, and in private exhortation; as the exercise of authority was more suited to the natural disposition of the human heart. 19 Against an elder <sup>n</sup> receive not an accusation, but * before <sup>o</sup> two or three witnesses.

Note.—The character of an elder, or pastor, was of very great importance: it would therefore be improper, not only to condemn him, but even to “receive an accusation against him,” except it was attested by two or three credible witnesses. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, Deut. 19:15—21.) Many might be disposed to revile those faithful ministers, whose doctrine and proofs had offended them; and indeed, the grand enmity of “the accuser of the brethren,” and of all his servants, would be excited against them. (Notes, Job 1:9—11. 2,4,5. Zech. 3:1—4. Rev. 12:7—12.) It was therefore highly reasonable, that no accusation, tending to bring the conduct of an elder to a public investigation, and thus to impeach or endanger his character, should be regarded, if supported only by one solitary testimony; which his denial of the crime would at least counterbalance. But, in respect of those who were evidently guilty of any scandalous offence, whether elders or 21 I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things, without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality.

22 Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins: keep thyself pure.

Note.—The apostle here most solemnly charged Timothy, as in "the presence of God, and the Lord Jesus Christ;" and as he hoped to join the company of "the elect angels," who had been preserved and confirmed in holiness, when many of their company apostatized and ruined themselves; who then witnessed his conduct, and would attend, when he should give an account of it to his sovereign Judge; (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 24:29—31. 25:31—33. 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) that he should observe those things with the utmost care and exactness, whatever opposition and trials he might incur; and, in all his regulations, carefully avoid "preferring one to another," through carnal affection, attachment, connexion, or obligations; not showing "partiality," either in censuring offenders, or ordaining elders, or in any other part of his important service. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Note, 2 Cor. 5:16.) In ordaining elders especially, he must be careful not to act in a hasty manner; but take time to examine into men's characters, principles, motives, and endowments, that he might not be induced "to lay hands" on improper persons, by impotency employed in their behalf. He would need great care, in this immensely important concern, to avoid being "partaker of other men's sins;" and becoming answerable, in part at least, for the crimes of those who thus intruded into that sacred function, to the dishonor of God, the great detriment of the church, and the ruin of immortal souls: for even an obliging and easy temper might betray him into much criminality, from which he must by all means keep himself pure. (Marg. Ref. y—b.—Note, 2 John 7—11.)—It is manifest, that Timothy is here and elsewhere supposed to possess great authority in the Ephesian church, both in superintending the elders already ordained, and in ordaining others. It is allowed, that he was an extraordinary person, especially appointed by the apostle to this service; but there is no proof, that he conferred miraculous powers by the imposition of his hands, as the apostles did: and indeed it is altogether improbable. We cannot indeed by any means infer the divine right of episcopacy, from the authority exercised by Timothy, Titus, and other evangelists: yet it is at least highly probable, that it was very early found expedient, and conducive to peace, to have a stated presiding inspector, of approved wisdom and piety, who might superintend the pastors and the concerns of a few neighboring churches, as moderator and censor; and be peculiarly attended to in the appointment of church-officers. Hence a moderate episcopacy was very early, probably even while some of the apostles lived, generally prevalent in the church: indeed, this seems to have taken place, between the time when St. Paul gave his admirable parting charge to the elders, or bishops of Ephesus, and the time when St. John, from our Lord's own mouth, wrote epistles to the angels of the seven churches in Asia. (Note, Rev. 2:1.) And, after all the abuses, usurpations, controversies, and prejudices, which have since been introduced, the time may ere long arrive, when experience will convince pious men of different persuasions, that something of this kind, properly conferred, limited, and exercised, would prove a suitable remedy to those multiplied divisions, which so weaken and disgrace religious societies, which in doctrine, worship, and practice may be considered, in many respects, unexceptionable. 23 Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities.

Note.—This verse is a remarkable instance of the apostle's neglect of exact method, in inditing his epistles.—It occurred to his mind, when reflecting on Timothy's manifold cares and labors, that his frequent indispositions might be increased by too great abstemiousness; to the prevention of his usefulness, and the shortening of his days. He therefore broke in upon his subject, to counsel him, not to drink water any longer, at least as his only liquor; but to use a little wine to strengthen his stomach, and preserve his health.—We may hence form an estimate of the exact temperance, practised by these laborious servants of Christ; who so zealously pleaded the cause of Christian liberty, who placed no dependence on their own works, and who never prescribed their own

Note.—(Note, 21,22.) In respect of the choice and ordination of ministers, it might further be observed; that "some men's sins" were so notorious, and so easily proved, that they lay open before-hand, and anticipated the judgment, which ought to be formed of their conduct and pretensions. In other cases they "followed after," so that diligent and impartial investigation would be requisite in order to detect them. In like manner, some persons, applying for admission into the public service of the church, had a sufficient testimonial in their known and abundant good works, which were manifest before any peculiar enquiry was made: and when this was not the case, yet, upon due investigation, Timothy and others might become acquainted with them. So that in most instances, an impartial attention to the business, without respect of persons, would enable those concerned to know who were, and who were not, eligible to public stations. (Marg. Ref.)—'I speak not of men, whose good or bad works are manifest before-hand; for they without further discussion or examination may be admitted, or are to be rejected; but of those whose vices or good works are latent. For they, after examination and inquiry, cannot be long hid. And so, if thou be not hasty in laying on of hands, thou mayest timely discover them. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

There is a respect due to the aged, which must not be withheld by their juniors, even when placed in authority over them, or on account of incidental faults. Every thing harsh and assuming must be improper, in the conduct of young ministers towards their seniors, as it would be in the conduct of a son to his parents. Indeed, admonitions are generally most efficacious, whether to old or young, when meekness and affection unite with firmness and faithfulness.—The greatest caution, as well as purity, is requisite in the conduct of ministers, (especially while in the prime of life,) as to their most needful converse with the younger women in their congregation, neighborhood, and acquaintance: that all occasion, appearance, and suspicion of evil may be prevented; and the neglect of this caution is very frequently productive of lamentable consequences in various ways: even where direct criminality does not take place, or is indeed designed.—It is an indispensable duty, for children and grandchildren, to requite the kindness of their aged parents; (Note, Gen. 48:15.) this "is good and acceptable with God;" nor are more distant relations exempt from a measure of the same obligation, when they can afford it; that neither the church, the parish, nor the public, may be charged; but that the contributions, raised in any way, may be applied to such as are really destitute. But, if any who profess the gospel, through sloth, providence, selfishness, or other corrupt principles, wilfully neglect or refuse to provide for their near relatives: they, in the apostle's judgment, virtually "deny the faith," and are even in this particular worse than their openly unbelieving neighbors. And may we not, by parity of reason, infer, that they who neglect to instruct their household in religious knowledge, and to do what they can for the salvation of their relatives, act altogether inconsistently with the Christian profession? (Note, Gen. 18:18,19.)—Aged widows, and others of good character, who are left destitute in the decline of life, ought to be honored, as well as supported. It seems the intent of these scriptures to teach us, that every religious society should, as far as it is able, make provision for persons of this description, and not leave them to sordid penury, or to the "tender mercies of the wicked," in their old age. But then this provision should be limited to such as "trust in God, and devote themselves to his service, in prayer and supplication, night and day;" at least to such as give evidence, that they are of a widely different character, from those "who live in pleasure, being dead whilst they live." Alas! what numbers are there of this latter description, among nominal Christians, even to the latest period of life! And how much does the same heaven work among more decided professors of evangelical truth! These things, however, we must give in charge, that the company of believers may be preserved blameless; or at least that we may deliver our own souls. (Notes, Ez. 3:17—19. P. O. 16—27.)

V. 9—16.

Every one, who is brought forth into notoriety in the church, should, as much as possible, be free from scandal; and many are proper objects of charity, who ought not to be employed in public services.—Those who, in domestic life, have shown most diligence, humility, compassion, benevolence, love to the people of God, and "readiness for every good work," are most likely to fill up leisure time profitably, and to be faithful in whatever is intrusted to them.—It is not sufficient to determine, what would be best in itself, apart from all other considerations, in respect of things not absolutely obligatory, or things unlawful: the state of human nature and facts must be attended to, that it may be known what is most generally expedient. It might have seemed plausible to admit the young widows, or other young women, to such a service in the church, as implied an entire devoting of themselves to religion for the rest of their days; yet the apostle, not only with the wisdom derived from deep reflection and extensive observation, but under the influence of the divine Spirit; decided otherwise.

He knew that this would expose them to temptation, and lead many into sin; that it would tend to ensnare some of them into improper marriages, and even occasion their apostasy and ruin; that it would give others of them a habit of indolence, sauntering, slandering, intruding into matters not belonging to them, and improper conversation; that it would therefore, be generally better for them to be employed in the duties of the married state, and in the cares of a family; and that this would give less occasion to the enemies of the gospel to speak reproachfully, and Satan less opportunity of prevailing against them. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:32—35.) Alas! what immense numbers, in every age, have shown their total ignorance of human nature, and have done incalculable mischief, by attempting to improve on his plan, or rather directly to subvert it!

The office of a minister is “honorable” to all, those alone excepted who are a disgrace to the office: but the most prudent, faithful, and diligent, especially the most “laborious in the word and doctrine,” ought to be more honored than others, and best provided for. The reverse proportion indeed seems almost every where to be adopted in this matter: but the Lord will provide for his faithful servants, whatever method men may follow in disposing of their favors. (Note, Deut. 18:6—8.)—It may be expected, that the impartial public reprove will be exposed to the attacks of malicious calumniators: and, though his faults should not be connived at, accusations against him ought not to be regarded, except well authenticated: but those who give public offence by their crimes, should be rebuked publicly, that others may be put upon their guard.—All who are employed in important services in the church, especially in admitting men into the ministry, or allotting to them ecclesiastical preferments, or committing to them the care of immortal souls, in a diocese, or in a parish, or in any other way, or in taking cognizance of their conduct, should consider themselves as most awfully charged by the apostle, “before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, to observe these things, without preferring one before another.” The neglect of this rule, in the exercise of ecclesiastical authority, has given its opponents one of their most plausible arguments against it. So very much has been done, and is done, out of carnal respects, and “by partiality” to relatives, friends, and connexions; that the exercise of all authority of this kind has been and by numbers at present is considered as unlawful.—How far those concerned in ecclesiastical matters are culpable, in respect of “laying hands suddenly” on improper persons, without due inquiry and circumspection, or from complaisance to superiors, or friends, or relations; and how far this rule is observed or violated in all its extent; every man’s conscience must determine for himself, till Christ shall come to take an account of his servants. But it is certain that these things involve a responsibility of no ordinary magnitude; and that immense criminality must rest somewhere: as the multitude of ignorant, slothful, ambitious, avaricious, immoral, and heretical clergymen, who remain uncensured, throughout this land, and in every part of the visible church, most manifestly proves. There must somewhere be those, who are, in this respect, “partakers of other men’s sins,” and that in a most tremendous degree; and it must require great care and conscientiousness, for any one absolutely to “keep himself pure.”—It is extremely difficult, under any form of church-government, to conduct every particular, in such a manner as to “do nothing by partiality:” this will require circumspection, firmness, intrepidity, disinterested zeal, and “the meekness of wisdom:” and these cannot be obtained without much fervent prayer. These things, however, must be carefully observed by those, who would not “be partakers of other men’s sins;” as every person concerned must feel in proportion to his conscientiousness: but those who honestly desire to do their duty, will generally be directed in it. Some men’s sins will be discovered at once, “going before to judgment;” others require more diligent search; whilst the good works of others are manifest, and they that are otherwise may yet be known upon due inquiry: so that a sufficient judgment may generally be formed, for the regulation of men’s conduct, if their minds and hearts be free from prejudice and partiality.—Finally, let us observe, that eminent grace will connect the strictest temperance with the most fervent zeal for the liberty of the gospel: that it is the duty of every one to use proper means for the preservation of his health and life, as a debt which he owes to the church, the community, and his family: and that those who are frequently infirm, who labor abundantly in important services, and whose earnestness in spiritual things induces a disregard to animal indulgence, should attend to the advice of those, who give them proper directions for a due regard to their health.

CHAP. VI.

The duty of servants to unbelieving and to believing masters, 1,2. Timothy must shun those, as corruptors of the gospel, who teach things contrary to the apostle’s doctrine, 3—5. The advantage of godliness with contentment, 6—8. The mischiefs arising from the love of money, 9,10. The apostle exhorts Timothy to flee from these evils; to “follow after righteousness,” and “to fight the good fight of faith,” 11,12; and most solemnly charges him to be faithful till the coming of Christ, 13,14. He ascribes glory to the eternal God, 15,16. Timothy must charge the rich to avoid pride, and confidence in wealth; and to abound in liberality, as seeking a treasure in heaven, against the time to come, 18,19; and he must adhere to the faith, avoiding profane and vain controversies, 20,21.

Note.—(Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25. Tit. 2:9,10. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) The apostle next directed, that Christians, who were “under the yoke” of slavery, should quietly attend to the duties of their lowly situation; “counting their own masters” entitled to all the respect, fidelity, and obedience which that superior relation demanded; and not supposing that their religious knowledge, privileges, or liberty, gave them a right to despise their heathen masters, to speak or act disrespectfully to them, to disobey their lawful commands, or to expose their faults to their neighbors. This they ought to attend to, that “the name of God might not be blasphemed,” and his truth and worship reviled, among the Gentiles, by means of the failure of Christian servants in acknowledged duties. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, 5:13—15. Tit. 2:3—15.) And such of them, as enjoyed the privilege of “believing masters,” ought by no means to despise them, or withhold from them due respect and obedience; because they were brethren in Christ, and so upon a level in respect of religious privileges: but rather “to do them service,” with double diligence and cheerfulness, because of their faith in Christ, and their interest in his love, as partakers of the inestimable benefit of his salvation. (Marg. Ref. d—h.)—This shows, that Christian masters were not required to set their slaves at liberty; though they were instructed to behave towards them in such a manner, as would greatly lessen and nearly annihilate the evils of slavery. It would have excited much confusion, awakened the jealousy of the civil powers, and greatly retarded the progress of Christianity, had the liberation of slaves by their converts been expressly required by the apostles: though the principles of both the law and the gospel, when carried to their consequences, will infallibly abolish slavery. (Note, Ex. 21:2.)—These things Timothy was directed to teach and enforce, as matters of the greatest importance: and if any persons taught otherwise, and consented not to such salutary words, which were indeed the words of Christ “speaking by him,” and an essential part of “the doctrine according to godliness;” he must be considered as a self-conceited ignorant man, who, being puffed up with an opinion of his own abilities, was ambitious of distinction and applause, though entirely unacquainted with the real nature and tendency of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. i—o.—Notes, 1 Cor. 3:18—23. 8:1--3.)—It is not absolutely certain, to what set of men the apostle referred: but, as many of the Jews deemed it unlawful to submit to heathen governors; it is probable, some of the Judaizing teachers inculcated, that the worshippers of God ought not to obey heathen masters; and so paid their court to servants, by persuading them that they ought to assert their liberty. But there might be others also, who disregarded and despised these practical instructions; while their attention was taken up with curious and nice speculations and distinctions. Such persons, however, were to be considered as doting, or talking wildly, like sick and delirious persons, about hard questions and disputes of words, names, forms, or notions, which had no connexion with “the power of godliness.” Indeed, these questions and disputes tended to excite envy and competition between one and another, angry contests for victory and pre-eminence, mutual revilings and calumnies, injurious suspicions and jealousies; and absurd, obstinate, and violent controversies, between men “of corrupt” and carnal “minds,” who were destitute of the real knowledge of the truth and its sanctifying efficacy, and who only sought their own secular advantage; supposing religion to be valuable, in proportion as it tended to enrich them; as if gain and godliness had been but two names for the same thing! Thus they wanted to persuade the Christian servants, that the recovery of their liberty was to be considered as a Christian privilege of great value, which they ought to claim, whatever the consequence might be: and, from the same principle, they sought worldly lucre by their religious profession, and as their leading object. (Marg. Ref. p—s) From such men Timothy was exhorted “to withdraw himself;” and neither have acquaintance with them, nor spend his time in disputing against them. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, 2 Thes. 3:6—9. 2 Tim. 3:1—5.)

Note.—The proposition before mentioned, “that gain is godliness,” might be reversed, and thus contain a most important truth. Godliness, connected with a contented mind, is indeed very “great gain;” as it tends to a man’s present comfort and everlasting benefit, whatever his outward circumstances are. (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, 4:6—10. Phil. 4:10—13.) For men bring nothing into the world with them; but are born helpless and destitute, except as Providence supplies all their wants; and it is most certain, that no man can take any thing along with him when he leaves the world. (Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, Job 1:20—22. Ps. 39: 6. 49:6—20.) So that, a subsistence during his journey is the utmost, that any one can have of earthly things; and a very mean and scanty provision will answer that end, as well as a more luxurious and abundant one, and occasion less temptation and sin. In a short time all these things will be finally done with; whereas godliness will soon be perfected in eternal felicity. “Having therefore food and raiment,” (or covering, including both raiment and habitation,) and things barely needful for the present, we ought to be contented and satisfied with them; without indulging any desire of acquiring greater affluence, or of being exempted from hard labor and mean fare. (Marg. Ref. a.) For discontent in a lowly situation commonly produces a determination to be rich, if possible; and leads men out of the plain path of honest industry and prudent economy, in dependence on the providence, and obedience to the commandment of God. It is indeed, evident from facts, that they “who will,” or purpose, if possible, to “be rich,” give Satan the opportunity of tempting and ensnaring them into such actions, as cannot consist with godliness or a good conscience; urging them to use dishonest means of increasing their gains, and a variety of fraudulent practices. This betrays them into such a multiplicity of employments, and hurry of business, as leave no time or inclination for spiritual religion; and it introduces them into such connexions and companies, as draw them still further into sin and folly. Thus they are brought under the power of “many foolish and hurtful lusts,” even “the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life;” which mock their expectations, and prove most injurious to themselves and others; till they plunge into inevitable ruin and eternal perdition: as men are drawn in by the vortex of a whirlpool, when they venture too near it, and so are swallowed up and drowned, without any possibility of escape. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Matt. 13:22. Eph. 4:20—24. 1 John 2:15—17.)—For when once “the love of money” is allowed to rule in the heart, it becomes the prolific root of all kinds of evil. Impostures, frauds, lies, thefts, robberies, oppressions, murders, ungodliness, hypocrisy, apostacy, contention, lawsuits, wars, cruelty, pride, luxury, sensuality, or penurious avarice, are some of the noxious weeds, of which it daily produces a most abundant increase, according to the different constitutions, habits, and circumstances of mankind. Every species of impiety, iniquity, and vice, in one way or another, grows from it; and a large proportion of the miseries, as well as the crimes of mankind originate from the same source. And while some professed Christians, even in the apostle’s days, had coveted riches, they had been seduced into apostacy, or led to corrupt the faith, or to act grossly inconsistently with it: and thus “they had pierced themselves through,” as with wounds made by a sword, in every part of the body; so that even those who were not finally ruined, were filled with many sorrows, and must endure the most exquisite anguish, in consequence of their folly. All this would have been avoided, if they had been “contented with food and raiment,” and watched and prayed against the desire of being rich. (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Notes, Luke 12:15—21. Heb. 13: 5,6.)—It is not to be supposed, that the apostle meant to establish, as a universal proposition, that every kind and every act of wickedness, grew from “the love of money,” as from their only root: for doubtless, many kinds and innumerable acts of wickedness spring from other roots; which have scarcely any connexion with the love of money: and Cicero, in his Offices, states, that the love of money itself, in many and most insatiable instances, springs from love of power and dominion, for which it is indispensably requisite. But, whoever well considers what influence the desire of riches, not only to hoard them, but to purchase with them the gratification of pride, ambition, sensual inclinations, and even revenge, has on the conduct of mankind, will readily see, that, as a general truth, there is sufficient ground to aver, that "the love of money is the root of all evil." The abandoned prostitute, Judas who sold his Lord, the traitor who sells his country, and the mercenary teacher of religion, combine in saying, "What will ye give me?" It was the remark of a corrupt, but able statesman in this nation, that 'every man has his 'price;' and it is in some sense true of every man, who is "a lover of money," of pleasure, or of worldly honor, more than "a lover of God." The ambitious conquerors and destroyers of mankind, have always loved money, as the means of accomplishing their object; and have extorted it from those in their power, with the most entire disregard to justice, truth, and mercy. Nor did any one ever desire to revenge himself, or remove a rival, by assassination or perjury, but some wretch could be found disposed by love of money to perpetrate the villany. (Marg. Ref. b.)

Old Testament, concerning the ancient prophets, the apostle addressed Timothy as a "man of God," one devoted to God, and employed by him as his messenger to mankind: (Marg. Ref. i.—Note, Deut. 33:1.) as one who bore this high and important character, he exhorted him to "flee," without delay or looking back, to the utmost distance from that destructive whirlpool, in which such immense numbers were continually swallowed up; and to "follow after" more entire conformity to the perfect rule of universal "righteousness," by an upright, faithful conduct towards all men; a proper temper and behavior towards God in every thing; a lively faith in Christ, and the divine promises in him, as well as faithfulness in his stewardship; "love" to the Lord, to his brethren, and mankind; "patience" under sufferings, and "meekness" amidst injuries and provocations. (Marg. Ref. k—m.) Thus let him "fight," with consecrated armor, "the good fight of faith;" maintaining the honorable and profitable conflict against sin, the world, and Satan, to which the gospel animated him: let him contend earnestly for the prize, by faith and self-denying obedience; by mortifying sin, by resisting temptation, by enduring hardship and persecution, and by using every means with all earnestness and persevering diligence, of weakening the kingdom of Satan, and advancing that of Christ in the world. After this manner let him press forward, till he laid hold, in actual possession, of eternal life; unto which he, as well as the apostle, had been called by the special grace of God, (Note, Rom. 8:29—31. 2 Tim. 1:9.) and had, in consequence, made an honorable profession of the truth, before many witnesses, at his baptism, when ordained to the ministry, and especially in his subsequent labors and sufferings as a preacher of the gospel. Note.—To confirm Timothy in the purpose of persevering amidst his various trials and perils, the apostle solemnly “charged him,” as “in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things;” or giveth life to all, and could therefore preserve his life, however exposed, and would certainly raise him again to immortal glory, if he laid it down in his cause; and “before Jesus Christ,” who had boldly borne witness to the truth, and avowed himself “the Son of God, and the King of Israel,” in the presence of Pontius Pilate, when he knew that he should be delivered up to be crucified for maintaining that claim; (Notes, John 18:33—36. 19:8—12.) who required his servants thus constantly to confess him before men; and who had promised to confess them that did so, “before his Father and the holy angels.” (Marg. Ref. r—t.—Notes, Matt. 10:32,33. Mark 8:38. Luke 12:8—10.) As “in the sight of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ,” the apostle charged Timothy “to keep the commandment” before given, or the trust committed to him, without the spot or blemish of any miscarriage, neglect, or unfaithfulness, from fear of man or love of the world; that he might be “unrebukable;” that his brethren might see nothing to reprove in him; that the world might have nothing to say against him; and that his Lord might welcome him as a “good and faithful servant;” and also to deliver it ‘down to those who may succeed thee, unspotted;’ that it may shine with uncorrupted lustre, ‘through all future ages, till the appearance of ‘the Lord Jesus Christ.’ Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. u—z.—Note, 1:5.) In this let him persevere, till “the appearing of the Lord Jesus;” which, “in his times,” or the appointed season, that glorious God would display in the sight of the whole world, who is “the blessed,” or most happy, “and only Potentate;” possessed of absolute, universal, and eternal dominion, “the King of kings, and Lord of lords,” from whom all power and authority are derived and delegated; who alone possesses immortality in himself, having underyived, unalienable, and unchangeable existence, perfection, and felicity; who inhabiteth “the light” itself, being surrounded with glories so resplendent that no man can possibly approach to him, except in and by his incarnate Son; whom no man ever “did, or ever can, see” with his bodily eyes, being a Spirit and the object of intellectual vision alone; to whom honor and power everlasting ought to be ascribed, by all intelligent creatures. Amen. (Marg. Ref. a—f.—Note, 1:17.)—The Godhead itself seems to be here adored, without distinction of Persons; of which all these things are properly spoken, whether the Person of the Father, of the Son, or of the Holy Spirit, be mentioned. The invisible God is revealed to us, only in and through the human nature of Christ, as “the only begotten Son” of the Father. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. John 1:18. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:3,4.) And this display of the divine glory will be rendered most illustrious, when Christ shall be seen as Man, exercising all the power, authority, and perfections of God, by the whole assembled universe. (Notes, Matt. 16:24—28. 25:31—46. John 5:20—29. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Tit. 2:13. Rev. 20:11—15.)—“Without spot,” ‘in respect ‘of the commandment itself, and “unblamable,” ‘in respect of thy performance of it; which will ‘contribute to preserve the good confession in ‘the world, “till the appearing of our Lord ‘Jesus Christ.” Macknight. This is true and important, and indeed implied: but the apostle constantly in his exhortations referred to the appearing of Christ; not to establish it as a doctrine, that it was near in respect of time, but to inculcate a continual readiness for it, and an habitual regard to it, in the whole conduct of Christians to the very close of life.

Note.—A few rich persons had, it seems, embraced the gospel at Ephesus; and, as wealth is a comparative thing, some more wealthy than their brethren must be found in other places. Now Timothy and other ministers might be tempted to pay them undue deference; or to be afraid of speaking plainly to them, either in public or private; which would have a very bad effect on their ministry; and it would require much firmness and impartiality to give them proper counsel, caution, and instruction. The apostle therefore peculiarly enjoined Timothy, to charge them in the most plain, authoritative, and solemn manner, to warn them against the danger to which they were exposed, and to call on them to perform the peculiar duties of their station. He must "charge those that were rich in this world," (which is perfectly distinct from being "rich toward God,") that they should not be "high-minded," or elated by affluence, and superiority of circumstances; as if these implied more wisdom or excellency, or conferred on them higher privileges, ensured them more regard from God, entitled them to pre-eminent authority in the church, exempted them from censure or reproof, or authorized them to neglect or contemn others: and that they should not confide in their riches; as if wealth could make them safe and happy, increase their present comfort, give them any permanent advantage, or promote their eternal felicity. (Notes, Job 31:24—28. Ps. 62:8—10. Jer. 9:23,24.) They must "not trust in uncertain riches;" as all worldly property was liable to be torn from them; as it often proved the cause of distress, temptation, and sin; and as it must speedily be left at death, and be given an account of at the day of judgment. (Marg. Ref. g—k.—Notes, Matt. 6:19—24. 19:16—26. Luke 12:13—21. 16:1—15.) Timothy must therefore charge the rich, as well as the poor, "to trust in the living God," both for present safety, support, and comfort, and for eternal happiness; remembering that he gave them bountifully all the things which they enjoyed; and in order to their thankful enjoyment of them. (Marg. Ref. l—o.) They ought therefore to acknowledge him as the Author of their abundance: it was all given them in his wisdom, revocable at his will, and could only be profitable to them, when used to his glory. (P. O. Deut. 8.) They must therefore be earnestly exhorted and warned, by the authority of God himself, "to do good" with their riches, and to count this their duty and happiness; instead of avariciously hoarding, or luxuriously wasting them. By relieving the wants of the indigent, and largely contributing to the support and comfort of their poor brethren, and by other pious and charitable actions, they must aim to be "rich in good works" the genuine fruits of faith and love. (Notes, Jam. 1:9—11. 2:5—7.) They must be prompt and liberal in distributing their wealth to proper objects, and for valuable purposes; as the husbandman scatters his seed without grudging, in hopes of a future harvest. (Notes, Ec. 11:1—6. 2 Cor. 9:6,7.) Thus they would treasure up "for themselves" (not for their heirs, or they knew not whom, as misers do their idolized wealth,) the true riches, and lay "a good foundation" for their hope and comfort, in the approaching season of affliction and death; showing their faith in Christ, (the Rock of salvation,) by the unequivocal fruits of love and obedience: that so they also might "lay hold on eternal life" now in lively hope, and at length in actual possession; (Notes, 11,12. Matt. 7:24—27. 1 Cor.

3:10—15.) when the self-indulgent, the covetous, and ungodly rich men around them, would "lift up their eyes in hell, being in torments." (Marg. Ref. p—x.—Notes, Luke 16:19—31.)

20 O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called;

21 Which some professing, have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with thee. Amen.

Note.—The apostle, considering the snares and temptations, the allurements and terrors, which Timothy had to guard against and overcome, in order to the faithful fulfilment of his ministry; and reflecting also on the various species of false religion, which many artfully substituted instead of the humbling, holy gospel of Christ; again most affectionately and earnestly called upon him to keep inviolable, without shrinking or wavering, the stewardship, or deposit with which he had been intrusted. And he warned him to shun the "profane and vain babblings" of those, who wanted to impose on Christians the foolish and frivolous traditions and observances of the Jewish scribes, as well as the rites of the Mosaic law. He must turn away from "the oppositions of science," or knowledge, "falsely so called," such as those, with which the Gnostics, or knowing ones, afterwards corrupted the gospel. These speculations were borrowed from the vain philosophy of the Gentiles; and being distorted and mutilated, to suit their purpose, men introduced them into Christianity; to render it more congenial to the heart of man; and especially to gratify their fondness for disputation, and pride of superior penetration and acuteness. Thus, one corrupt system of boasted knowledge was opposed to another; jangling controversies were multiplied and perpetuated; the truth was obscured and overlooked; and the wildest absurdities were substituted in its place. Some, even then, having been seduced into these speculations, had "erred from the faith" into fatal heresies; and the evil was likely to increase. Hav-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

It is most important to the honor of the gospel, that professed Christians should duly perform their various relative duties; and that "servants count their own masters worthy of all honor," even though they be unbelievers. Their condition indeed, in this favored land of liberty, allows them to change one situation for another: but the precepts of scripture do not at all permit them to behave with disrespect to the persons, or disregard to the lawful commands of those whom they serve: nor yet to return affronting answers, or to speak of their masters' faults to others without cause; but rather to weep over them and pray for them in secret, when they are ungodly and unreasonable. Alas! how grievously are "the name and gospel of God blasphemed," through those servants, who love to discourse and dispute about doctrines and sermons, in families averse to such subjects; and then behave with impertinence in their places, if not with sloth, dishonesty, and unfaithfulness! Thus thousands are fatally prejudiced against the gospel. Nay, this is so little attended to, that many masters who would be glad to have pious servants, and to behave to them like brethren, as far as it is consistent with domestic subordination, are often wearied out, and tempted to prefer servants who know not the gospel, and are regardless of religion, because of the misconduct of many who profess it. Indeed, some servants whose sincerity is unimpeached, through a lamentable mistake, suppose equality in religious privileges to imply equality in the family: and thus they act, as if they "despised their believing masters" and their authority; giving them rude answers, and either neglecting their business, or doing it in their own way; as if this was a part of their Christian liberty! Whereas they ought to honor and serve them, with the greater diligence and alacrity; because "they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit." No doubt there are violations of duty, equally inexcusable, committed by those who stand in the opposite relation; and zealous professors of evangelical doctrines are accessory to believing servants choosing to live in irreligious families, by behaving in so unchristian a manner to such as have come among them, expecting better treatment.—Ministers are bound to teach and enforce the duties of all ranks and orders of men, in the church and the community: and "if any one teach otherwise," and speak contemptuously of these exhortations, and consent not to "salutary words," which are indeed the words of our Lord, and a part of "the doctrine according to godliness;" he ought to be deemed "a proud man, who knoweth nothing;" whatever his gifts and profession may be; and he should be pitied and shunned, as a distempered man, who is infected by the love of abstract "questions, and strifes about words; whereof cometh envy, contention, reviling, evil surmises, and perverse disputing." This is manifest from daily observation: to these things "men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth," are peculiarly addicted; especially when they can make them subservient to their emolument and reputation, being disposed to think that the best religion, by which they can get the most money or worldly advantage in one form or another. Instead of engaging in controversy, with such mercenary, self-wise, and ignorant wranglers, who will not consent even to the apostle's words, or to those of Christ himself; we should withdraw from them, and thus protest against them, and leave them to dispute by themselves or with one another.

V. 6—12.

We ought always to remember, "that godliness with contentment is great gain." As "we brought nothing with us into the world, and can carry nothing out;" let us trust him, who has hitherto provided for us, to supply our wants during the remnant of our pilgrimage. "Having food and raiment," we should daily beg of God, that we may be contented with it; and that he would keep us from every degree and kind of covetousness.—We cannot look about us at all, without perceiving that "they who will be rich, fall into temptation," are entangled "in a snare," "and are overcome by many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all" kinds of "evil," in every part of the earth. Even among those who profess much to value the gospel, we often see piety, charity, mercy, equity, sincerity, temperance, and humility, laid like so many bleeding sacrifices on the altar of Mammon; while men's own souls, and those of their ill educated children, are destroyed to gratify the malignant demon! Many hopeful persons, by allowing themselves to covet something greater, more elegant or affluent, have "erred from the faith," have "made shipwreck" of their religious profession, or have turned out mere thorny-ground hearers; and others "have pierced themselves through with many sorrows," to the embittering of all their future lives. No words can express, no description reach, the numberless and horrid evils, which continually flow from this source; especially in a day of outward prosperity, extensive commerce, lavish expense, and loose profession! But, "what is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"—Let every Christian flee from this destructive lust: let "the man of God," especially, avoid every appearance of "the love of filthy lucre," or improvident expense: let us, on the contrary, "follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness," with that assiduity and earnestness, with which worldly men pursue perishing riches: let us fight the noble and profitable fight of faith, and thus "lay hold on eternal life, to which we also are called;" and strive to act consistently with that good profession, which, in our ministry, we have made of the truth, before many witnesses; who will at last testify against us, if we "forsake Christ from love of this present world."

V. 13—21.

The apostle charges each one who ministers in holy things, and not Timothy alone, as "in the sight of God who quickeneth all things, and of Christ Jesus who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession; that we keep the commandment of God, without spot and unrebukable, till the appearing of Jesus Christ." Let none suppose, that "our Lord delayeth his coming." In his own times, he will be manifested, as "the Effulgency of the divine glory, the Image of the invisible God." This will be brought to pass by "the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in inaccessible light," and invisible to human eyes. In order that we may be "presented faultless before" the divine Redeemer's "presence, with exceeding joy," receive the crown of glory, and be admitted to the beatific vision; it behoves us now to be faithful, watchful, sober, diligent, and disinterested. Thus honoring our God here, and desiring to ascribe to him glory and power to eternity; he will honor us at last before the assembled universe. (Notes, Col. 3:1—4. 1 John 3:1—3. Jude 22—25.)—Ministers are required especially to instruct rich men in their peculiar duties; because they are numerous and important, and to charge it on their consciences, that they perform them: as well as to warn them of the peculiar dangers of their situation. While nature prompts us to desire connexion with them; it produces a reluctancy to that part of our duty, which relates to them. Even modesty, timidity, gratitude, or supposed prudence, may warp us in this matter: a false apprehension of what may conduce to their best interest, that of our religious society, or of the church at large; and a fear of prejudicing and offending them, and so losing the opportunity of doing good to them, or by them, may easily mislead us in this great concern: not to speak of the dread of their frown, and the credit and advantage of their friendship; both which are very ensnaring to the ministers of the gospel. But we must break through all these obstacles, if we would be faithful stewards and vigilant watchmen, and "deliver our own souls." We must "charge them in the name of God not to be high-minded, nor to idolize, or at all to trust in uncertain riches;" and not to seek happiness from them, but from the "living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy." We must show them the danger to which they are exposed, of being betrayed into pride, avarice, ambition, self-indulgence, and the love of outward splendor. (Note, Matt. 19:23—26. P. O. 23—30.) We must point out to them the proper use and improvement of their wealth; charging them to "do good, to be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate:" we must call on them to provide against the time to come, when it will be said to them, "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward." (Note, Luke 16:1—8. P. O. 1—13, 19—26.) We must exhort them so to use present advantages, that they may "lay up for themselves" a better treasure, and ensure a good hope, and know themselves to have a firm foundation, in a dying hour, "that they may lay hold on eternal life."—But "who is sufficient for these things?" Or who can give such charges with energy, that is not himself evidently superior to the love of wealth, or any thing which wealth can purchase? May the Lord help us all to "keep these things, which are committed to our trust," to "avoid profane and vain babblings," disputations, philosophy, and "oppositions of science falsely so called;" by which so many are drawn away from a believing dependence on a crucified Saviour, and from preaching the doctrine of the cross to others, with faithfulness, and earnestness, and effect.—May the time speedily come, when all bishops shall give such charges to their respective clergy, as holy Paul gave to his son Timothy: and when all who consecrate or admit them to that most responsible office, shall charge them as the apostle charged Timothy in this grand concern.—And may the grace of the Lord Jesus be with all his faithful ministers and people every where, and at all times! Amen.

TIMOTHY.

THE apostle was evidently a prisoner at Rome when he wrote this epistle: but some suppose that it was written during his first imprisonment, as the epistles to the Ephesians, the Philippians, the Colossians, Philemon, and the Hebrews were. Others, however, are of opinion, that it was written when he was imprisoned a second time, and not long before he suffered martyrdom: and this appears to me by far the most satisfactory.—"The ancients from these words ... "I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," (4:6.) do gene erally conclude that this was the last of Paul's epistles. ... And truly the words of the apostle '... are not well capable of any other sense; for he says expressly, (4:6.) ... "I am now offered, and the time of my dissolution is instant. I have finished my course, and henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of glory." (8). Whereas he not only expected to be delivered from his first bonds, but says expressly, "I know that I shall abide, &c." (Phil. 1:25, 26. Philem. 22. Heb. 13:23.) ... In his first bonds, he was in libera custodia, "in his own hired house, receiving all that came to him, none forbidding him." (Acts 28:30,31.) "His bonds were known in Cæsar's palace, and to all others." (Phil. 1:13.)—Here he is in arcta custodia: so that Onesiphorus was forced to "inquire more diligently after him, that he might find him out." (1:17.) Again he said before, "Many of the brethren in the Lord being encouraged by my bonds, were bold to speak the word more abundantly without fear." (Phil. 1:14.) Here "all men forsake him." (4:16.) Whitby.—Timothy was with Paul, when he wrote to the Philippians, to the Colossians, to Philemon, and to the Hebrews. (Phil. 1:1. Col. 1:1. Philem. 1. Heb. 13:23.) Mark was also with him, and joined in saluting the Colossians; but both were absent when this epistle was written. (4:11.)—Should it be argued, that they came to him before he wrote the other epistles; what can be said concerning Demas? For he was with the apostle when he wrote to the Colossians, but had forsaken him when he wrote this epistle. (4:10. Col. 4:14.) The supposition, that Timothy and Mark had come to the apostle, before he wrote the other epistles, implies that this was written a considerable time before those: but the assumption, that Demas had repented, and returned to the apostle, when he wrote to the Colossians, implies, that the epistle to Colossæ was written some time after. Yet, these contradictory suppositions must both be admitted, to support the opinion, that this epistle was written during the apostle's first imprisonment. Indeed, the language used in it, implies that the apostle considered himself, as one who had finished his ministerial labors, and after a severe imprisonment, perhaps for some time longer, was about to close his testimony by martyrdom. (Notes, 1:15—18. 4:6—8.)—It is also questioned, where Timothy was when the apostle wrote to him. It is generally thought that he resided at Ephesus: and indeed this is probable, though not certain. (Compare 2:16—18. 4:14 with 1 Tim. 1:20.—See Notes, 4:9—13,19—22.)—It was evidently the scope of the epistle to animate Timothy to endure persecutions, with courage and constancy: to caution him and others against false teachers, and corrupt professors of Christianity; the increase of whom, the apostle predicted in most energetic language; and to direct and animate him in fulfilling his ministry, and in following after holiness.—"The apostle had been for some time under close confinement at Rome, at the mercy of a cruel and capricious tyrant. He had seen himself deserted by his friends, in his greatest extremity, and had nothing before him but the certain prospect of being called to suffer death, in the same cause to which he had devoted his life. In this situation, how does he behave? Does he seem to look back with concern on his past conduct; or to regret the sacrifice he had made of his worldly interests? Can we discover any thing, that betrays a secret consciousness, or even a suspicion of the weakness of his cause? Nay, does he drop a single expression that can be interpreted as the mark of fear, or discomposure of mind, in the apprehension of those gloomy scenes that lay before him? Surely, if he had been an impostor, or had entertained the least doubt of the doctrines he taught, something of the kind would have escaped him when writing to a friend, with whom he could intrust all the secrets of his breast.—On the contrary, upon the most calm and deliberate survey, he expresses an entire satisfaction, in reflecting on the part he had acted; and earnestly recommends it to his beloved pupil, to follow his example, in maintaining the glorious cause, even at the hazard of his life. He appears throughout the epistle to have felt a strong conviction of the truth of those principles he had embraced; and glories in the sufferings he had endured in support of them; triumphing in the full assurance of being approved by his great Master, and of receiving at his hands a crown of distinguished lustre." Doddridge.

CHAP. I.

The apostle affectionately salutes Timothy with thanksgiving and prayer, 1—3, and expresses a great desire of seeing him, 4, remembering his faith, and that of his grandmother and mother, 5. He exhorts him to stir up the gift of God which is in him, 6. He charges him not to be ashamed of the divine testimony, or of him the Lord's prisoner; but to prepare for sufferings; as having been saved, and called by the grace of God, according to the gospel, which fully reveals life and immortality, 7—10. Of this Paul had been made an apostle; for which cause he suffered, without being either ashamed or afraid, as he knew the power of him in whom he trusted, 11,12. He exhorts Timothy to steadfastness and faithfulness, 13,14; shows that those of Asia had turned from him, 15; and commends the diligent and courageous kindness of Onesiphorus, praying fervently that he and his family might find mercy from God at the last day, 16—18.

PAUL, <sup>a</sup> an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, according to <sup>b</sup> the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus,

Note.—The gospel, intrusted to the apostle by the will and appointment of God, was according to "the promise of life" and salvation, made from the beginning, to fallen man, through the predicted Messiah: (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) all the prophecies to this effect were fulfilled in Christ; and then the promise of life was sent to Jews and Gentiles without distinction. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Rom. 15:8—13.)—"Adam brought the sentence of death upon us all, and the promise of deliverance from that death is only made to us, through Jesus Christ, by virtue of that death which he suffered in our stead." Whitby.—"Thus he shows, that the gospel is not new; but the very thing which God promised by the prophets. ... 3 <sup>e</sup> I thank God, <sup>f</sup> whom I serve from my forefathers <sup>g</sup> with pure conscience, <sup>h</sup> that without ceasing, I have remembrance of thee in my prayers <sup>i</sup> night and day;

5 When <sup>n</sup> I call to remembrance the <sup>o</sup> unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois and <sup>p</sup> thy mother Eunice; and <sup>q</sup> I am persuaded that in thee also.

Note.—The apostle returned hearty thanks, on Timothy's account, to the one living and true God, whom he worshipped after the manner of his pious progenitors in successive ages, from Abraham to that time; or, according to the revelations of a Saviour vouchsafed to them. (Note, Acts 24:10—21. 26:4—8.) For indeed they all looked forward to the Messiah, and served God with a believing regard to him: though their descendants had rejected and crucified him, and now persecuted those who believed in him. The apostle had indeed formerly been a leader of these persecutors; but his "conscience was" now "purged from dead works," by the atoning blood of Christ, and made tender and well-informed by divine grace: so that "he served God with a pure conscience" and cheerfully, with spiritual worship and believing obedience. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) He was especially thankful, that he was excited and enabled continually to remember Timothy, in his fervent and frequent prayers, by night and by day: being mindful of the tears which Timothy shed, as expressive of his love and sorrow, when they last separated; and longing greatly for another interview, which, he was assured, would fill his own heart with joy and satisfaction. This persuasion arose from his frequent recollection of "the unfeigned faith," which Timothy's whole conduct had manifested to dwell in him, and to influence and sanctify his heart. This was the same precious faith, which had first "dwelt in his grandmother

Lois, and his mother Eunice." These pious women seem to have "waited for the consolation of Israel" before they heard the gospel, and thus were prepared to receive it: and having diligently given Timothy a religious education, it greatly conduced to his being made partaker of the same faith, as the apostle was fully persuaded concerning him. (Marg. Ref. h—q. —Note, 3:14—17. Acts 16:1—3.)—It is not unlikely, that Timothy accompanied the apostle to Miletus; and parted with him there, accompanying the Ephesian elders, when they returned to Ephesus.

Note.—(Note, 1 Tim. 4:11—16.) The spiritual gifts, conferred by the laying on of the apostle's hands, probably at Timothy's ordination, ought to be diligently exercised, in the performance of the ministry intrusted to him; or the office itself may be intended. The apostle however reminded him to "stir up the gift of God that was in him," by meditation, prayer, and diligence; as the fire being stirred, or blown upon, is made to burn clearly and glow, though before it seemed expiring.—Thus love, zeal, and compassion for souls, being brought into vigorous exercise, Timothy would be animated to improve his talents, and fulfil his ministry, with ardor and effect. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) For the Holy Spirit, whom God gave to established believers as a Comforter, (Note, John 14:15—17.) was not the Author of a timid disposition, or of slavish fears. vigor and energy to spiritual affections, and endued them with strength for service or suffering; while love to Christ, his people, and all mankind, animated them to self-denying and perilous labors; and "a sound mind," a sober judgment and heavenly wisdom, led them to choose the noblest ends, and to pursue them in the persevering use of the most prudent and effectual means. So that the spirit of a lively Christian was that of courage, firmness, zeal, and wise consistency of conduct, in the midst of persecutions and temptations. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, Rom. 8:14—17. Gal. 4:4—7. 1 John 4:18.)—Timothy was therefore exhorted, "not to be ashamed" of that testimony, which he had borne to the Lord Jesus: nay, he must not hesitate to avow himself the fellow-laborer and dutiful son in the faith, of Paul the despised and imprisoned apostle of Christ. On the contrary, he ought willingly to become a partaker of those afflictions, which were to be endured for the gospel; depending for support, protection, and comfort under them, "on the power of God," which would certainly be exerted in his behalf. 9 Who <sup>r</sup> hath saved us, and <sup>s</sup> called us with a holy calling, <sup>h</sup> not according to our works, but <sup>i</sup> according to his own purpose, and grace <sup>k</sup> which was given us in Christ Jesus, <sup>l</sup> before the world began;

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Lord had "saved" the apostle and Timothy, and their Christian brethren; or brought them into a state of salvation, having "called them with a holy calling;" as the Holy Spirit, by whom they were called, is the Author of all holiness; and as the gospel through which they were called, is of a most holy nature and tendency. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. Eph. 1:3—8. 1 Thes. 4:6—8. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) This calling had not been "according to their works;" for if God had dealt with them by that rule, they must have been left under condemnation: but it was "according to his own purpose, and grace which was given them in Christ before the world began;" that is, his purpose of giving them grace, in and through Christ Jesus, which was engaged to him, as the appointed Surety of his chosen people, "from eternal ages." (Marg. Ref. h—l.—Note, Tit. 1:1—4.) Various ways of setting aside the obvious meaning of the verse, as implying personal election "from the beginning," or "before eternal times," have been proposed: but none of them can be maintained, as it appears to me; without supposing, that all, who live and die impenitent and unbelieving, may nevertheless be said to be "saved and called with a holy calling;" because a Saviour was promised from the beginning of the world. Indeed, "the purpose of God" is expressly mentioned, as the reason why they, rather than others, were thus "saved and called."

Note.—This "purpose of God," respecting the calling and saving of sinners, by grace given them in his Son, "before the world was," had at length been made manifest by his appearance in human nature; when, through his righteousness, atonement, resurrection, ascension, and mediation, he "abolished death," terminating his reign and dominion, and depriving him of his sting and terror, in respect of all believers; who might, through him, face that dreaded enemy in his most tremendous form, with comfort and confidence; being assured of the immediate entrance of their souls into glory, and a future triumphant resurrection of their bodies from the grave. (Marg. Ref. m—p.—Notes, 1 Cor. 3:13—23. 15:50—53. 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21—26. 3:20,21. 1 Thes. 4:13—18. Heb. 2:14,15.) By the publication of the gospel, likewise, Christ "had brought life," spiritual and eternal, and a state of immortal felicity attainable by sinners, into full light; and had given the most explicit declaration of the nature and certainty of that future happiness, and of the way in which it may be obtained. (Marg. Ref. q.) Whatever notions and convictions, any of the Gentiles had concerning the soul's immortality; they knew nothing of the way in which eternal life might be enjoyed by sinful man; they were wholly ignorant of the meaning annexed in the scripture to the words, "life and immortality." Their speculations served only for amusement or disputation, being blended with error and fable, involved in obscurity and uncertainty, and utterly inefficacious on their practice. The Jews indeed had a revelation in the Old Testament, both of a future state, and of the resurrection of the body. But it was far less full and explicit, than that in the New Testament; it was chiefly confined to one small nation; and it was very imperfectly understood and believed, even in that one nation. (Note, Matt. 22:23—33.) So that whatever had been conjectured or believed, before the coming of Christ, concerning a future state; it might properly be said, that "he had brought life and immortality to light by the gospel:" the doctrine respecting it was placed in the most convincing and interesting light; every proper question about it was satisfactorily resolved; and the whole was suited to answer the most important practical purposes.—Indeed, after all modern improvements and supposed demonstrations; the influential belief of the immortality of the soul, and a future state of retribution, rests wholly on divine revelation; as well as that of the resurrection of the body, and the way of a sinner's acceptance. If indeed it can be demonstrated, that the soul is naturally capable of immortality; it certainly cannot be proved, except from immediate revelation, that almighty God will not terminate its existence, especially as it is forfeited by sin; or that he will not make every transgressor miserable in immortality: for immortality may be endless misery; but the gospel, which expressly states this, (Notes, Matt. 25:41—46. Mark 9:43—50.) also clearly connects "life," with "immortality," in respect of all who believe. (Note, John 11:20—27.) So that it should exceedingly enhance our value for "the oracles of God," when we clearly perceive the insufficiency of 'the oracles of reason,' in the most important of all concerns.

Note.—St. Paul had been "appointed a preacher, and an apostle," of the gospel as before described, in order that he might proclaim "among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ," and instruct them in the way to immortal life and happiness. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, Luke 2:25—32. Acts 13:42—48. 26:16—18. Eph. 3:1—8.) But, instead of receiving honor and affluence, as a recompense for his labors, he suffered all kinds of injuries, and was then in a gloomy prison as a malefactor, continually expecting an ignominious death. He was not, however, in the least "ashamed" of having engaged, and spent so many years, in the service of that Saviour whom men thus despised and hated: for he knew, by firmly believing the word of God, by divine teaching, and by happy experience, the power, faithfulness, and love of him, "whom he had believed;" and, as he could not doubt of his compassion and kindness, so he was fully persuaded of his authority and ability to take care of him in all events. He had "intrusted" his life, his soul, and his eternal interests, into the hands of Christ, as a precious deposit. He had discovered especially the value and danger of his immortal soul; he had been convinced that as he could not himself, so none else in the universe could effectually deliver and secure it, through the trials of life and death; and that Jesus both could and would. He had therefore long before, and in habitual reliance and renewed and constant application to him from time to time ever since, "intrusted" it in his hands, by faith and prayer; to be washed, justified, and sanctified, and at last to be produced complete in holiness, and meet for glory. What he might pass through, by the way, he knew not: but he was "persuaded," that Christ was fully able to keep the precious deposit to that day, to which he continually had respect, as the grand accomplishment of all his hopes, when his beloved Lord would again 'appear in glorious majesty 'to judge the world.' (Marg. Ref. s—b) His most important interests, therefore, being thus secured beyond the reach of all enemies; he was prepared to endure ignominy, pain, and death, without shrinking: hoping to commit his departing soul into his Saviour's hands, even as Jesus himself had commended his spirit into those of his heavenly Father. Note.—After the above animating declaration of his own experience and joyful confidence, in the midst of sufferings and the near prospect of a violent death; the apostle exhorted his beloved Timothy to "hold fast," in a steadfast profession, and by faithful preaching, "the form of sound words," the substance of evangelical truth, which he had heard of him: and of which perhaps he had given him some commendable epitome. This he must "hold fast in faith and love," by which the soul has communion with Christ, and receives communications from him; and so holds the truth in a vital and efficacious manner: and he must thus guard himself and others, against the innovations which false teachers were introducing by unsound and specious words. (*Marg. 15 ¶ This thou knowest, <sup>k</sup> that all they which are in Asia <sup>l</sup> be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

Note.—The caution above given was the more needful for Timothy, as he must have heard, that "all they who were in Asia had turned away" from the apostle. Some understand this of those ministers and Christians, who were natives of Asia professing Christianity, and had been with St. Paul at Rome; but who had shamefully deserted him in the season of his greatest danger. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that the churches in Asia, (or that district of which Ephesus was the metropolis,) had withdrawn their regard from him, being perverted by heretical teachers. (Notes, Rev. 2:1—7.) Some indeed interpret it of the Judaizing teachers; but those who had always openly opposed the apostle, could not be said to be "turned away from him." These, however, and other false teachers probably had succeeded in alienating many of the apostle's converts. Yet the first interpretation seems to be the true one, and is established by the context. (Note, 16—18.)—The expression, "Thou knowest," may only mean, "No doubt thou hast heard;" and to mention two individuals of whom better hopes had been formed, to Timothy while resident in Asia, and witnessing the defection of many churches, would have been wholly unnatural. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Acts 19:8—12.)

18 The Lord grant unto him, <sup>s</sup> that he may find <sup>t</sup> mercy of the Lord <sup>u</sup> in that day. And in how many things he <sup>x</sup> ministered unto me at <sup>y</sup> Ephesus, thou knowest very well.

Note.—Onesiphorus was, no doubt, an exception to what had before been said concerning those of Asia: and it is probable he resided at Ephesus, where his family then was; and that he had been at Rome, and still was at a distance from them. (4:19.) The apostle therefore prayed for them separately; (Marg. Ref. m;) because Onesiphorus, by his company and assistance, had greatly refreshed and enlivened his spirits, and had not been ashamed of being known to be his friend when he wore a chain, as many others had been. (Marg. Ref. n—q.) He had bestowed much pains to find out the place of St. Paul's confinement, and had at last succeeded. This shows that the apostle's imprisonment was far more close and severe than before; so that Christians in general scarcely knew where he was, and many of them were afraid to inquire after him. (Preface, Note, Acts 28:30, 31.) He therefore prayed, that Onesiphorus might find mercy in the day of Christ: for Timothy "knew very well," in how many things he had served him at Ephesus, and ministered to his wants, and he had now proved the genuine constancy of his affection.—The eager manner, in which the Papists catch at the unfounded notion that Onesiphorus was dead, because the apostle prayed separately for his household, and yet afterwards prayed for him also; shows how entirely destitute their practice of praying for the dead, is of scriptural proof; and how glad they would be to meet with some countenance for it in the word of God, if that could be done.—*The Lord grant, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

The "promise of eternal life" to all who believe in Jesus Christ, is the leading subject in the preaching of those ministers, who are employed "according to the will of God:" and though outward dispensations vary; yet his real people have, in every age, substantially the same religion, and serve God after the manner of their forefathers and predecessors, "with a pure conscience;" being partakers of the same "grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ."—The tears of loving Christian friends, when separated at the call of duty, make way for their fervent prayers for each other; their earnest desires of meeting again on earth, lead to the cheerful hope of a blessed re-union in heaven, and the fulness of joy to which they will then be admitted; and their remembrance of the clear evidences of "unfeigned faith," which they have witnessed in each other, excite their thanksgivings to God for his grace bestowed upon them. (Notes, Acts 20:36—38. P. O. 32—38. 1 Thes. 1:1—4.)—The pious instructions and fervent prayers of believing parents, are often the means of conversion to their children: yet, such as enjoy this advantage should be reminded, that they will derive no benefit from "the unfeigned faith" of the nearest relations, unless the same dwell in them also. We ought to exhort those, of whom we have the best opinion, "to stir up the gift of God that is in them," and to occupy with it in the duties of the stations allotted them.—The new nature, communicated in regeneration, leads to true liberty, and victory over the fear of man, and of those reproaches, contumelies, and injuries which may be expected in the path of duty. Whenever, therefore, we find our hearts discouraged: our hands weakened, or our earnestness in the work of the Lord abated; we should ascribe it to the remains of unbelief and a carnal mind, and to the temptations of Satan: and we should strive the more fervently in prayer, for "supplies of the Spirit of Christ," to invigorate our faith and hope, to "shed abroad the love of God in our hearts," to animate us with zeal and holy affections, and to produce in us a sound mind, and heavenly wisdom. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Phil. 1:9—11.) Then we shall "not be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord;" but glory in it, even among his most scornful enemies; we shall not hesitate to join ourselves to his most despised and persecuted servants; and we shall willingly become "partakers of the afflictions of the gospel," in dependence on "the power of God" to support and comfort us.—In proportion as "the Spirit witnesseth with our spirits, that we are the children of God;" and "that he hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose, and grace, given us in Christ before the world began;" we shall feel ourselves "constrained by love" to devote ourselves and all our talents to his glory. Thus we shall manifest the holy nature of our calling; and of that doctrine which is so much opposed and perverted by the pride and carnality of the human heart.

We should bless the Lord continually for "the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ," for what he has done and suffered to "abolish death," and for his gospel by which he has "brought life and immortality to light." As we have such decisive assurance of a future state, such full information concerning the nature of it, and so clear a prospect of immortal felicity, by faith in him "who is the Resurrection and the Life:" let us "give the more diligence," in making our personal interest in his salvation sure to our souls; and let such, as are appointed to publish these important tidings to mankind, and to instruct the nations in the truths of Christ, prepare for sufferings; knowing that his most honored servants have always been most conformed to him in this respect. If then we be despised and persecuted, for "this cause," let us not give place either to fear or shame: for he, "in whom we have believed," is able to bear us out, and to keep us safe "to that day," when he shall appear to perfect our felicity.—The hope of the meaneast real Christian rests on the same basis, with that of the greatest apostle. He too has learned the value and danger of his soul and eternal interests; and he intrusts them, by daily faith and prayer, in the Redeemer's hands, as the only security with which he can be satisfied. He too has "believed in him," and has some experience of his power, truth, and compassion: the answers which he has received to his prayers, and the change which has been wrought in his soul, increase and confirm his confidence; (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.) and thus he is "persuaded that the Lord Jesus will preserve him unto his heavenly kingdom," whatever dangers, trials, and enemies, he may meet with in his way thither.—In order to possess this good hope, we must adhere steadfastly to "the form of sound words," which the apostles have taught us: not only rejecting new notions, but new expressions; which are often employed to exalt one part of religion, by drawing the attention from others of equal importance. We must also be careful to hold even an orthodox creed "in faith and love which are in Christ Jesus:" this, as well as ministerial faithfulness, must be attempted "by the Holy Spirit which dwelleth in us;" and it will never be performed by those, "who trust in their own hearts," and "lean to their own understandings."—We need not wonder, that self-wisdom, and a contempt of the influences of the Holy Spirit, united with a dislike to the humbling truths of the gospel, and to bear the cross for Christ's sake, should turn so many, in these latter ages, from regarding the writings of the apostles; for similar causes turned many from them, even while the apostles were living, and confirming their authority and doctrine by the most undeniable miracles! But if others choose to follow the example of Phygellus and Hermogenes, let us copy that of Onesiphorus, by seeking out the afflicted servants of Christ, and refreshing and ministering to them; not being ashamed of their poverty or disgrace, though laid in dungeons or workhouses; and doing them all the good we can, with a constant affection, for the Lord's sake. Then shall we have an interest in their prevailing prayers; (Note, 2 Cor. 9:12—15. P. O. 8—15.) then we may thus hope for the mercy of God upon our families; and may rest assured of "finding mercy of the Lord in that day," when we shall most know its unspeakable value. And let those, who are thus comforted and relieved by their brethren, not be backward to acknowledge their obligations, or negligent in praying for them and all their connexions.

CHAP. II.

Timothy is exhorted to appoint faithful ministers; and to courage, diligence, fidelity, and patience, as "the good soldier of Christ." 1—7; in remembrance of Christ as risen from the dead, 8; in imitation of the apostle's example, 9,10; and in assured faith and hope, 11—13. He must warn the flock against false teachers, and vain controversies; studying, as an approved workman, "rightly to divide the word of truth," 14—16. The pernicious effects of the error of Hymeneus and Philetus, 17, 18: yet "the foundation of God stands sure," and "all who name the name of Christ" should "depart from iniquity," 19. Some are vessels of honor, others of dishonor; but Timothy must seek to be the former, 20, 21. He is taught what to flee, and what to follow after, 22; to shun disputatious questions; and to instruct opposers with meekness, in hopes of their being recovered from the snare of the devil, 23-26.

Note.—The apostle next exhorted his beloved "son" Timothy, to be bold and zealous in preaching "the grace that is in Christ Jesus," for sinners; or rather to be strong in dependence on the grace of Christ. (Marg. Ref. a, b. —Notes, 1:6-8. Hag. 2:3-5. 1 Cor. 16:13, 14. 2 Cor. 12:7-10. Eph. 6:10-13, v. 10.) In order to preserve and diffuse the knowledge of the gospel among men, he directed him to commit those doctrines, which he had heard from him, concerning the Lord Jesus and his salvation, "among many witnesses," (or "by many witnesses," who all concurred in attesting them,) "to faithful men," established believers, and men fitted to be "faithful stewards," who might be able to teach others also. This does not indeed prove, that the people had no concern in the appointment of their own pastors, or of ministers to preach the gospel in dark places: but it undeniably proves that Timothy had a superintending authority; and was empowered to take heed, that none should be appointed, except "faithful men, who were able to instruct others also." It can scarcely be supposed, that there was any competition at that time. The apostles, and those sent by them, would doubtless select the most suitable persons; and the people would cordially acquiesce in the choice. (Marg. Ref. c-g. —Notes, Acts 6:2-6. 14:21-23. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22. Tit. 1:5-9.)—The communication of divine truth to mankind, by a succession of witnesses, from age to age, was thus effectually provided for.

5 And if a man also <sup>n</sup> strive for maste-ries, yet <sup>o</sup> is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully.

Note.—Timothy was again called on to consider himself, as "a good soldier of Christ." (Notes, 1 Tim. 1:18-20. 6:11, 12.) Having enlisted under his banner, he was bound to follow him and obey his orders; he must be ready to expose his life in the cause of the gospel, and at all hazards endeavor to promote it. As therefore soldiers, in actual service, must expect great fatigues and hardships, as well as dangers; so he ought to be prepared for sufferings and difficulties of every kind. And as no man, who engaged in the military life, "entangled himself" with the management of husbandry or commerce, but left such employments to others, that he might be wholly at liberty to please the commander, under whom he served, and thus to obtain preferment and honor; so Timothy must not engage in secular business, or any of "the affairs of life;" which might interfere with his pleasing Christ, who had chosen him to be his soldier, and was able abundantly to make up all losses to him.—It is plain from the apostle's own example, that ministers may, on some occasions, earn their bread by labor: but this widely differs from seeking to grow rich by trade, or such employments as engross the mind and time, and introduce them into such connexions, and involve them in so many pecuniary engagements, as greatly endanger their own characters, and the honor of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. k-m.)—In the public games also, the man who strove for mastery, was not crowned victor, unless the contest had been managed according to the prescribed rules: it therefore behoved Timothy and his brethren, to regulate their diligence and earnestness by the word of God; otherwise they could not expect the conqueror's crown. And as the husbandman must "first labor," before he partakes of the fruits of the field; so they must first diligently and patiently execute their ministry, before they received the gracious recompense. This is the most obvious meaning of the verse: but it may signify, that the laboring husbandman must first be supported by the fruits of the earth, or he cannot perform his work; nor can the office of the ministry be duly exercised, except by those who live by faith in Christ themselves, as well as preach him to others. Timothy ought therefore well to consider these illustrations, and the Lord would give him understanding in all things pertaining to his work and circumstances.

10 Therefore, <sup>b</sup> I endure all things <sup>c</sup> for the elect's sakes, that they may also <sup>d</sup> obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, <sup>e</sup> with eternal glory.

11 It is <sup>f</sup> a faithful saying, <sup>g</sup> For if we be dead with him, <sup>h</sup> we shall also live with him:

12 If <sup>i</sup> we suffer, we shall also reign with him; <sup>k</sup> if we deny him, he also will deny us:

13 If we believe not, <sup>l</sup> yet he abideth faithful; <sup>m</sup> he cannot deny himself.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Amidst all dangers and sufferings, it behoved Timothy to “remember Jesus Christ,” the promised Saviour, “of the seed of David, who had been raised from the dead.” This, which is literal, seems the proper translation, for Timothy was not only called on to remember, and preach to others, the resurrection of Jesus; but all the sufferings which preceded this great event, his conduct under them, and the glorious termination of them, in his exaltation as our Prince and Saviour. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, Heb. 12:2,3.) This could not fail to suggest proper motives and encouragements, to perseverance and constancy. For preaching that “gospel,” which related to these great transactions, St. Paul was then “suffering trouble, as an evil-doer, even unto bonds” and in prison: yet “the word of God was not bound,” but was successfully preached by numbers; and he was well satisfied, may he exult with joy. (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, Phil. 1:12—13.) For he willingly “endured all things,” which he was called to suffer, “for the elect’s sake;” and in order to be an instrument, in bringing them to “obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus,” even complete deliverance from all evil, with the full enjoyment of “eternal glory.” (Marg. Ref. b—e.—Note, 1 Cor. 9:13—18.) Thus he at once sought their salvation and his own: for it was “a faithful saying,” (probably in frequent use among Christians,) that “if they were indeed “dead with Christ,” to sin and the world, and ready to die for his gospel; they would assuredly live with him in that glory, which he entered on after his crucifixion and resurrection: (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, Matt. 16:24—23. P. O. 21—28. Notes, John 12:20—26. Rom. 8:14—17.) If they “denied him,” from dread of sufferings and death, or any other carnal motive, and persisted in this denial, Christ would also “deny them,” and leave them to perish with his enemies. (Notes, Matt. 10:32, 33. Mark 8:38.) If they dared not to rely on his word, would not credit his testimony, or were unfaithful to him, they would ruin themselves; but he would still “abide faithful” according to his covenant-engagements to his true disciples, and true to his word of executing vengeance on unbelievers. For “he cannot deny himself;” or act contrary to his word, and his own essential and divine perfections, out of partial favor or weak compassion: so that it behoved them all to “hold fast the beginning of their confidence steadfast to the end.” (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—Cannot. (13) Not for want of power, or liberty, but from perfect moral excellency.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Timothy was expressly required to remind Christians and ministers of the important practical truths before stated: and to “charge them” most solemnly, “as in the presence of the Lord,” not to strive and dispute about words, and those frivolous matters which the love of controversy magnified into important distinctions. These disputes could answer no good purpose: but, on the contrary, they tended to “subvert the hearers;” perplexing them about empty speculations, feeding their self-conceit and contempt of others, and drawing them off from the simplicity of faith and obedience. (Marg. Ref. n.—r.) Timothy himself also must “studiously endeavor to approve himself unto God,” in all his conduct and ministrations: he must bestow pains, that he might perform his ministerial services, “as a workman” who knew how to go about his business, and “needed not to be ashamed” of his performances, or afraid of having them most accurately examined. In preaching the gospel, he must “rightly divide the word of truth;” giving to every person his proper portion, according to his state, character, and circumstances. In this expression, the apostle is supposed by some, to allude to the skill, used by the priests and Levites, in cutting in pieces the victims, and dividing them according to the legal prescriptions; and by others to refer to the conduct of those, who carve for a large company, and are peculiarly careful that no one wants what is suitable for him. (Marg. Ref. s—x.)—To this conduct Timothy was required to adhere; and to “avoid the profane and vain babblings,” to which many paid undue attention: (Note, 1 Tim. 6:20,21.) for, however frivolous they seemed, the apostle foresaw that they would “increase,” and produce “more ungodliness” among men professing Christianity. For the words of such perverters of the truth, being of a poisonous nature, would imperceptibly diffuse their noxious influence, till they had eaten out the life and power of true religion; even as a gangrene, or a mortification, if not stopped, spreads in the human body, till it corrupts and destroys the whole of it. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) Of these vain disputers there seem to have been various descriptions: but the apostle mentioned Hymeneus and Philletus in particular, who had wandered far from the truth of the gospel: for they explained the doctrine of the resurrection in a mystical and allegorical manner; as if it meant the introduction of a new dispensation, or some moral change in men’s characters, which were events in themselves, or in respect of christians, already past; and thus they denied the future resurrection of the dead. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:12—19. 1 Tim. 1:18—20.) In this manner they had perverted the faith of some, and seduced several into fatal heresies, who had once made a promising profession of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. a—e.—Notes, Matt. 13:20,21. 2 Pet. 2:17—22. 1 John 2:18,19.)—Rightly dividing, &c. Note.—Notwithstanding those apostacies and delusions by which many were ruined; it ought to be firmly believed, that “the Foundation of God standeth sure.” Some have interpreted this of the doctrine of the resurrection, and others of election: but Christ himself, or the promise of eternal life to every one who believeth in him, is doubtless “the Foundation of God,” which the apostle meant. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Is. 28:16. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) This “stands sure:” “the gates of hell cannot prevail against it,” nor can any one who has truly built upon it, be fatally deceived. (Notes, Matt. 7:24—27. 16:18. 24:23—25.) According to the ancient custom, of sealing the foundation stones of magnificent structures, and engraving some inscription upon them; this mystical Foundation had the seal of God, and a double inscription, upon it. On the one side it was engraved, as it were, for the believer’s encouragement, “The Lord knoweth them that are his;” he knows his chosen: he approves, and takes special care of those, whom (Num. 16:5.)—On the other side, this seal is engraven, for the admonition of all professed Christians, and to mark the characters and direct the conduct of true believers; “Let every one, that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity.” Thus men must seek the assurance of their calling and election; thus they must evidence the sincerity of their faith and love, and show their gratitude for distinguishing grace; thus they will best avoid the snares of deceivers, and mark the difference between themselves and every kind of hypocrites. 20 But <sup>m</sup> in a great house there are not only <sup>n</sup> vessels of gold, and of silver, but also of wood, and of earth; and some to honor, and some to dishonor.

Note.—Still further to show, that the heresies and apostacies of many professed Christians, were entirely consistent with the engagements of God by his covenant to true believers; the apostle observed, that in a great house, the habitation of some wealthy person, there were not only “vessels of gold and of silver,” but others of baser materials; the former for honorable, and the other for meaner uses. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Note, Rom. 9:22,23.) In like manner, in the visible church, not only true Christians and faithful ministers were found, as willing instruments in the honorable work of glorifying God, and promoting the good of men; but persons also of a different character, whose hypocrisy and iniquity were over-ruled, contrary to their intentions, to fulfil his righteous purposes, though to their own ruin and “everlasting contempt.” (Notes, Matt. 13:24—30,36—43,47—50. 22:11—14. 25:1—4. John 15:2,6—8. 1 Cor. 11:17—22. 1 John 2:18,19.) If then any man, but especially a minister of the gospel, carefully “purified himself from these” evil things, and simply adhered to the truth and will of God; he would be “a vessel of honor, sanctified and prepared” for the service of Christ, and ready to be his willing instrument “in every good work.” (Marg. Ref. p—s.) The apostle therefore warned Timothy, not only to avoid false doctrines, but “to flee youthful lusts:” both the sensual indulgences, to which young persons are most liable; and also those impetuous passions, that rashness and love of novelty or controversy, and that desire of being distinguished, to which they are equally propense. And he exhorted him to pursue every holy temper, and diligently to practise every good thing himself, as well as to inculcate them on others: especially to “follow after peace with all those, who called on the Lord out of a pure heart,” or in sincere faith and love; notwithstanding their infirmities, and mistakes in matters of inferior consequence. suggested by folly, and a want of solid acquaintance with the majesty of God, with man's true condition and character, and with other subjects of the highest importance. For these questions, which different persons would answer in contrary ways, would "engender" fierce and hostile contests, among proud and obstinate disputants which would be managed with such acrimony and mutual revilings, or even injuries, that they might be called "fightings." (Note, Tit. 3:9.)—But, whatever Jewish or Gentile disputers did, "the servant of the Lord must not strive" in this manner, or with such weapons. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) On the contrary, he must be gentle in his address and conduct to all men, even to the most virulent and unreasonable opposers or perverters of the truth: he must be "apt" and ready to instruct men in the doctrines of Christ, with clear explanations, cool discussions, conclusive arguments and testimonies, pertinent illustrations, and kind language: at the same time he must patiently bear reviling, ridicule, cruel mockings and other ill usage, without recrimination or resentment. (Marg. Ref. b—g.) Thus in a meek, dispassionate, forbearing, and forgiving temper, he must continue to "instruct such as oppose themselves," however perverse and obstinate they are, provided they are willing to attend on the word; still hoping that "God, peradventure, will give them repentance." This may be sometimes the case, even in respect of such as are at present most obstinate and contumacious; and then they will humbly receive and profess the truth, and depend on the mercy and grace of God in Christ, for pardon, assistance, and deliverance. (Marg. Ref. h—m.) And should this take place, the servant of God would reflect with remorse on the sharpness which he had shown towards those, whom the Lord had mercifully borne with, notwithstanding their provocations. He ought, therefore, rather to hope and wait for their coming to themselves, "awaking as from sleep," or recovering as men from intoxication; and so "escaping the snare of the devil," in which he had entangled them, by his artful devices and suitable temptations, even as fowlers draw the birds into a fatal snare. That so they might "recover" their liberty; though they had been taken captive by Satan, as prisoners are after a battle, who may be disposed of at the victor's will; being consigned to death, to chains, or to slavery, as he pleases. For such men would remain entirely in the power of Satan; unless God should mercifully please "to give them repentance," and so effect their deliverance. (Marg. Ref. n—p.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Both the falls of some, and the good examples of others, should excite us to "be strong in the grace of Christ" and zealous in his cause.—None ought to be chosen or appointed to the sacred ministry, who are not "faithful men, and able to instruct others also:" and all concerned in this most important trust should be careful, to whom they commit the "stewardship of the mysteries of Christ:" for if they wilfully, negligently, or partially choose or ordain improper persons; they will be condemned for it "before many witnesses," however they here concealed their motives or excused their conduct. (Note, 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)—"The good soldier of Christ" must be ready at his Captain's word, to venture into the most perilous situations, and to endure the most extreme hardships. He ought therefore to be self-denying and courageous; one who loves his Leader, and is very zealous in his cause; and who firmly believes that he can make up all losses to him, even the loss of his life, which no other prince or general can do for his soldiers. It is highly desirable that those, who are engaged in this "holy warfare," should be exempted from the necessity of attending to secular business: but all, who would please their Lord, must avoid whatever is not absolutely necessary, and every thing which is "entangling."—While numbers wholly disregard these rules; some, who are active, and seem "to strive for the mastery," are not careful to "strive lawfully:" for they either spend their zeal about outward forms, human inventions, and doubtful disputations; or they use unsanctified weapons, furnished by bigotry and resentment; or those which involve a measure of duplicity and dissimulation.—We should also labor in patience and hope, assured "that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not," without vainly expecting to receive our reward, till we have given proof of our persevering diligence. (Note, Gal. 6:6—10.)—In all our hardships, conflicts, and temptations, we must "remember the Lord Jesus," and meditate daily on his sufferings, his resurrection, and his subsequent glory. Thus we shall learn to expect trials, and be the less disquieted "if we suffer trouble as evil-doers, even unto bonds;" knowing that no power can bind the word of God, or prevent the success of the gospel, when he sees good to prosper it. And, if "the mind of Christ" be in us, we shall be willing "to endure all things for the elect's sake," and to promote the salvation and eternal glory of those chosen ones, for whom Christ willingly laid down his life. (Notes, John 10:14—18. 11:49—53. Rom. 5:6—10. Phil. 2:5—8. Heb. 12:2,3.) "It is a faithful saying," that if we be thus "dead with Christ, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him." But he will deny before his Father's throne, those who deny him before men; and his truth as much ensures the unbeliever's condemnation, as the believer's salvation; for "he cannot deny himself;" and "heaven and earth shall pass away, but his words shall not pass away." (Note, Matt. 24:32-35. P. O. 29-35.)

Ministers must "charge" their flocks "before the Lord," with great solemnity and earnestness, "not to strive about words," or the Shibboleths of a party; (Note, Judg. 12:1-7.) which tend to no profit, but rather "to the subverting of the hearers." In performing this part of our duty, we shall be likely to give much offence: for eager controversy is exceedingly agreeable to the vitiated taste of the carnal mind, which loaths plain practical instruction. We should therefore "study to show ourselves approved unto God," and to obtain his seal to our ministry: we should bestow pains to become skilful, as well as faithful preachers; "workmen that need not be ashamed;" instructors, who "know how rightly to divide the word of truth," and to give every man the portion which belongs to him, with close application to his heart and conscience. (Note, Matt. 24:45-51.) This will lead us to a distance from "profane and vain babblings, which continually increase to more ungodliness;" for many a specious error is allowed, without notice, to be privily brought in among professed Christians, which gradually eats like a gangrene, and destroys "the power of godliness" in an imperceptible manner. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:31-34. Gal. 2:1-5. 5:7-12. 2 Pet. 2:1-3.)—Scarcely any thing has done more mischief within the church, and among those who retain a regard for the scriptures, than the manner of "Hymeneus and Philetus," in allegorizing away its plain doctrines and precepts, and so causing them to evaporate in some visionary mystical notion. This some call spiritualizing; but it well answers the purpose of deceivers, though often used by well meaning injudicious persons. It excites the wonder of the ignorant, and the disgust of rational men: and thus it takes off the one from the substantial part of religion, to amuse themselves with fancies; and it increases the prejudices of the other against evangelical truth. Nothing can be so crude, so foolish, or so evidently erroneous, but it will subvert the temporary faith of some professors of the gospel: for of all the numberless delusions, which have been or may be invented, there is not one, but is more congenial to the pride and lusts of men, than the simple truths of the holy scriptures. (Note, John 8:41-47.)

V. 19-26.

Amidst all heresies, schisms, and apostacies, "the Foundation of the Lord standeth sure." Secure and happy are they who build on it by an obedient faith! He knows them as his own people; and they may know this of themselves, by diligent care to "depart from iniquity," and to honor the name of Christ in a holy conversation. These are the "vessels of gold and silver," which the Lord has "before prepared unto glory," whom he has "sanctified and made meet for his own use, and ready for every good work;" and when "the vessels of dishonor" shall be consigned to destruction, these will be "filled with all the fullness of God." Let us then in dependence on the promises of God, and diligent attendance on every means of grace, "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit;" let young Christians and ministers "flee youthful lusts;" let all "follow after righteousness, faith, love, peace, with all them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart;" and let the frequent repetitions of the apostle teach us the immense importance of avoiding foolish, curious, and frivolous questions, and whatever can produce strifes and angry controversies. Alas! how little it has been remembered, that "the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle towards all men, apt to teach, patient!" Numbers seem to think that the reverse should be his character and conduct; and that zeal for doctrinal truths is incompatible with gentleness, meekness, patience, and love. This predilection for controversy, both in teachers and hearers of the gospel, is one grand hindrance to our "recovering sinners out of the snare of the devil;" for to exasperate opposers is by no means the way to convince them.—The artful enemy of our souls knows how to bait his hook and spread his net for men, according to their different tastes, humors, and situations. He conceals the danger, and allures them with the prospect of honor, gain, or pleasure. They do not suspect the deception, till they have swallowed the bait, or are caught in the net: then they are "taken captive by him at his will;" and they sometimes appear under a kind of necessity of proceeding in their ruinous courses. Yet, some are "recovered out of the snare;" for when "God gives them repentance," they come to themselves, they "acknowledge the truth," they confess their guilt: they cry for mercy and deliverance, they obtain pardon and grace; they are set at liberty and "walk in newness of life;" and Satan can never more regain his dominion over them. (Notes and P. O. Luke 15:11-24.) There is no "peradventure," in respect of the readiness of God to pardon those who do repent; but we cannot tell whether he will "give repentance" to those, who still continue to oppose his will: yet, as he sometimes grants it even to the most obstinate of his enemies, it is our duty to hope and pray for them, and "in meekness to instruct them," as long as we have the opportunity. And if any feel themselves "taken captive by Satan," and long for deliverance; let them remember, that they can never "recover themselves out of the snare of the devil," except by "acknowledging the truth of God" in the gospel, that this they never can do without repentance; that repentance is the gift of God; and finally, that they must ask it of him by earnest, persevering prayer.

CHAP. III.

The apostle foretels grievous times, "in the last days," through the atrocious wickedness of those, who would retain "the form, without the power of godliness." 1-5; and the devices and opposition, of false teachers, 6-9. He proposes his own example to Timothy, 10-13; exhorting him to continue in the faith, 14; and showing the excellency, authority, and sufficiency of the sacred scriptures which Timothy had known from his youth, 15-17.

THIS know also, that "in the last days" "perilous times shall come.

Note.—The apostle foresaw, and foretold to Timothy, and so to the church in that and in all future generations, that “in the last days,” or under the Christian dispensation, chiefly in the latter ages, “perilous” or grievous times would arrive; in which it would be extremely difficult for Christians to escape the contagion of bad examples and corrupt principles; or for ministers to preach the unadulterated truth of the gospel; and in which those who retained their integrity would be exposed to the hatred and persecution of their professed brethren. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Is. 66:5,6. Rev. 11:7—12. 13:5—17. 17:6.) For, while the love of Christ, of one another, and of all men, distinguished real Christians; a race of nominal Christians was about to arise, who would in general “be lovers of their own selves,” in a carnal, inordinate, and exclusive manner; being “covetous” and greedy in getting and keeping wealth at any rate, and idolatrously trusting in it. They would be vain-glorious “boasters,” and “proud” of their genius, learning, sagacity, and supposed merits: “blasphemers” of the perfections, truths, and ways of God; “disobedient to parents;” “ungrateful” to God, and to earthly benefactors; “unholy” and profane; destitute of “natural affection” to parents, or “children;” “truce-breakers,” ready to violate promises and covenants, being unfaithful to every trust reposed in them; “false accusers of others,” in order to find a pretence for persecuting them; given up to the excessive indulgence of their appetites: “fierce” and savage in their tempers; not loving, but “despising, good men” and good things; “betrayers” of those who trusted them; of a seditious and turbulent spirit respecting rulers; rash and impetuous; “high-minded;” haughty and imperious; and lovers of sensual or dissipated “pleasures, rather than lovers of God,” delighting in these gratifications, and not in the Lord and his holy service. (Marg. Ref. c—q.) Yet, along with all these hateful vices, they would retain “the form of godliness,” professing Christianity, attending on sacred ordinances, and appearing to be religious: while they renounced “the power of godliness;” and at least practically denied, that it ought to have any sanctifying influence on their affections, tempers, and conduct. (Marg. Ref. r, s.) From persons of this character Timothy was directed “to turn away,” and to have no fellowship with them.—We need not suppose, that the same individuals would answer to every part of this description; but men would arise, called Christians, who would be guilty of these vices; some being more notorious in one way, and some in another, even as the heathens were, and differing from them only in name. (Note, Rom. 1:28—32.)—Such persons have always been found within the visible church, in every place, and through all succeeding ages hitherto; and some even among those who have most zealously contended for the peculiar doctrines of the gospel. Many such were soon perceived in the primitive church; but things grew “worse and worse” (13), till the grand anti-christian apostasy was produced. The selfishness, enormous covetousness, “high swelling words of vanity,” and blasphemous claims and titles of the church of Rome, have generally been supposed to be pointed at, in an especial manner. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:3—12.) The practice of that church in counselling children to “disobey their parents,” and parents to withdraw their natural affection from their children, in order the more readily to replenish religious houses with monks and nuns; their disregard of the most solemn leagues and covenants, and want of all faith and mercy towards those whom they falsely accused of heresy; their enmity against true Christians; the licentiousness countenanced by indulgences and dispensations; their fierce persecutions; their arrogant conduct towards princes and emperors, have certainly exceeded every other corruption of Christianity which has yet appeared: nevertheless, they have always maintained, and been very exact and pompous in their “form of godliness.”—It is self-evident, that the apostle foretells what the state of things would be in the visible church, and among the professors and ministers of Christianity. No doubt, the Jews, just before the destruction of Jerusalem, answered in many things to the description here given; and so do numbers of nominal protestant Christians at this day. There was, however, no occasion to warn Timothy to “turn away from” persecuting Jews; but “the mystery of iniquity was already working,” and it was necessary for faithful ministers to protest against it, in the most decided manner. 6 For <sup>a</sup> of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women, <sup>x</sup> laden with sins, <sup>y</sup> led away with <sup>z</sup> divers lusts,

9 But they shall proceed no further; for <sup>f</sup> their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as theirs also was. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Even in the apostle’s days there were such men as he had described; who, in a covert manner, and with subtle insinuation, crept into families, prying into their affairs, winding themselves into confidence, gaining ascendancy over the consciences, and perverting the souls of the unstable, for their own interest or that of their party. These deceivers singled out the weakest and most credulous women; that they might take advantage of their want of information and discernment, to work upon their imaginations and passions. Their success was also chiefly among such “as were laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts;” perhaps such, as before they professed Christianity, had been addicted to licentiousness; and not being renewed by divine grace, but merely restrained by temporary convictions, were ready to hearken to the flatteries and soothing delusions of false teachers, and to embrace a carnal, self-indulgent religion; which would at once give quiet to the conscience, and license to sinful passions.

They were also such as were “ever learning,” bestowing pains to become acquainted with religion, but running after every new teacher, and hearkening to every novel notion, continually shifting from one thing to another, and thus “never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.” (Notes, Prov. 14:6. Rom. 16:17-20. 1 Cor. 3:1-3. Eph. 4:14-16.) These were the persons whom the false teachers first assailed; and, by their insinuations and flatteries, they reduced them into a kind of “captivity” to them; that by their means they might accomplish their covetous, ambitious, or licentious purposes. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:1-3, 18-22. Jude 9-19.) Now as the Egyptian magicians, (whose names were reported by tradition, and by some ancient writers, to have been Jannes and Jambres,) withstood Moses by counterfeiting his miracles; thus endeavoring to bewilder Pharaoh’s mind, that he might not regard the message of JEHOVAH; so these false teachers withstood the truth, by deceiving men with a false gospel, and various lying pretences; being corrupt and depraved in their minds, alienated from the faith of Christ, and rejected by God, as hypocrites or apostates. But they would not be able to proceed any further in their opposition to the gospel, than the limits prescribed to them in the wisdom of God: and at length their folly would be published to all men, even to their most devoted adherents; even as that of the magicians was, when “the boil was upon them” as well as on the other Egyptians. (Notes, Ex. 7:11, 12, 22, 23. 8:7, 8, 18, 19. 9:11.)

He had indeed had full opportunity of knowing accurately the doctrine, which St. Paul had preached in every place; "the manner" in which he had lived, the leading aim and "purpose" which he had pursued in the most determined manner; with every particular, concerning his spirit, conduct, and ministry; he had fully considered these several particulars; and he had attained to a full acquaintance with them. (Note, 2 Cor. 6:3—10.) He had especially observed the patience, with which he had endured persecutions in several places. It is highly probable, that Timothy was converted to Christianity during the apostle's first progress through the cities of Asia Minor, and that he was an eye-witness of St. Paul's sufferings at that time. This satisfactorily accounts for his mentioning the persecutions, which he endured at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, rather than more recent ones which Timothy had not witnessed.—Antioch in Pisidia is evidently meant. (Notes, Acts 13:49—52. 14:5—7, 19, 20. 16:1—3.)—Indeed, it was a general rule, that if any man was determined to live a godly life, in dependence on the atonement and grace of the Lord Jesus, and according to his precepts, he would certainly be exposed to persecution. A "form of godliness," without any direct connexion with the doctrine of faith in a crucified Saviour; or a profession of that faith, without the example of a godly life, might be endured and tolerated: but the open profession of "the truth as it is in Jesus," and a resolute attention to all the duties of vital godliness, would excite the scorn and enmity of mankind; nor could any abilities, wisdom, amiableness, or beneficence, secure a man from all the effects of their persecuting animosity.

Note.—Instead of matters taking a more favorable turn, the apostle predicted, that "wicked men and seducing teachers" would grow more and more subtle, daring, callous, malicious, cruel, covetous, and ambitious; deceiving others, and being themselves deceived, by their own delusions, and by Satan's wiles. (Note, Ez. 14: 9—11.)—The history of the Christian church, through all the subsequent ages, forms an awful demonstration, that he "spake as he was moved by the Holy Spirit;" so that all the declamations of infidels against the impostures, persecutions, wars, and massacres, occasioned by Christianity, are only so many attestations to the truth of the religion contained in the holy scriptures, and in the profession and lives of a remnant through every age; and they bear against nothing, but that spurious Christianity, which was long before predicted and condemned by the Spirit of prophecy.—The individual deceivers, whom the apostle had in the preceding verses described, would soon be put to shame: but others, succeeding them in the same course, would, from age to age, carry on a similar plan of deception, with more diabolical subtlety and iniquity; being themselves deceived by Satan, while employed by him to deceive mankind. (Notes, Rev. 12:7—12. 13:8—10. 19:17—21. 20:1—3.) The original word for "seducers," (γοητεῖς.) signifies magicians, or enchanters, such as Jannes and Jambres had been; that is, men who, by lying pretences to miraculous powers, opposed that gospel, which had been confirmed by real and indisputable miracles. (Note, 6—9.) Now it scarcely admits of a doubt, what company of men, since the apostle's days, have most exactly answered this description. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:8—12. Rev. 13: 11—17.)

Note.—The apostle, applying what he had before stated, called on Timothy diligently to maintain and persevere in the profession and preaching of that doctrine, which he had learned and assuredly believed; knowing that, through his ministry, he had received it from God himself; and remembering, that it accorded to the holy scriptures, with which he had from his childhood been acquainted. These, when properly understood, were "sufficient to render him wise unto salvation," and to instruct him in all things pertaining to it; as they all spoke of the promised Messiah, and prepared the mind for receiving him by faith, and submitting to his authority. (Notes, Luke 24:25—31, 44—49. John 5:39—47. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9, 10.) For all the writings of Moses and the prophets were "given by inspiration of God," to instruct men in divine things; and every part of them was not only perfect truth, but "profitable," to teach them "sound doctrine," respecting God and themselves, the eternal state, the way of acceptance and of holiness, and other most interesting and difficult subjects; to "reprove" and convince them of their errors and sins, that they might learn their guilt and danger, and so value and embrace the remedy proposed; to "correct" and regulate their judgment, affections, and conduct; and to "instruct" them in every part of universal righteousness, with the obligations, motives, and encouragements to it. #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The descent of a stone to the earth is not more natural, than fallen men's propensity to turn away from God: so that, whatever means are used to bring them to love him and one another; the end will not be attained, unless by the continual influence of his new-creating Spirit.—We need not therefore, wonder, that even "in the last days," under the fullest external revelation, which God has made to man, "perilous times soon came;" and professed Christians became "lovers of themselves," lovers of money, of honor, "and of pleasure, rather than lovers of God." Our land at this day abounds with such nominal disciples of Christ, as are here described. Some are selfish and covetous; others proud boasters and blasphemers; many regardless of their duty to parents or children, relatives and rulers; being "unthankful and unholy." Very many are slanderous, treacherous, intemperate, licentious, profligate, "fierce," implacable, "despisers of good men, traitors, heady, high-minded:" and who can number those, "who are lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God?" Can any man seriously think, that these crimes are less abominable in men called Christians, than they were in heathens? Can any one doubt, but that they will be more terribly punished? In fact, in proportion to the zeal and exactness, with which "the form of godliness" is retained, when "the power of it" is denied, the more criminal and dangerous men become, and the more should they be avoided and protested against. For when any form or notion of religion, is made a cloke, or an excuse, or a compensation for wilful transgressions of the divine law; the danger becomes greater, than from men who openly cast off all regard to God. Hypocrisy, superstition, enthusiasm, and antinomianism, are infectious beyond other mental maladies: the poisonous draught is more dangerous, when so mingled as to resemble some valuable medicine; and "a wolf in sheep's clothing" is most dreadful to the unsuspecting flock. (Notes, Matt. 7:13—20.) Of this genus (which is divided into various species, popish and protestant, ancient and modern, learned and unlearned,) there have ever been artful men, who have insinuated themselves, by pompous or plausible pretensions and flatteries, into the favor and confidence of the weakest, most credulous, most ignorant, and imaginative of the human species; and who have taken them captive, by soothing them into quietness, "when laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts." Those weak and deluded persons, who want a safe and comfortable religion, without self-denial, humiliation, and mortification of their lusts, "are ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth;" and readily fall in with artful and interested deceivers of any description. For "as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses," by aping his miracles, so do such men resist the truth by a counterfeit gospel; and by substituting visions, superstitions, or curious speculations, in the stead of repentance, faith, and holy obedience. Such delusions act like opiates; they lull the conscience into a soothing sleep, and increase the disease; and they are administered by men "of corrupt minds, who are reprobate concerning the faith," of whom all should beware. But, though it is grievous to perceive, that "evil men and seducers grow worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" we may yet rejoice that they cannot exceed their limits; that they cannot fatally delude the upright believer; and that at length, "their folly will be made manifest to all men," as that of their predecessors during a long succession of ages has uniformly been.

V. 10—17.

In order to escape and expose every seduction, we ought to get well acquainted with the doctrine and example of the apostle; and to copy his "manner of life," his "purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, and patience." Let us then frequently reflect on his persecutions, supports, and deliverances: let us count our cost, and know assuredly, that "if any man determine to live godly in Christ Jesus, he must suffer persecution" in one way or other; as far as Providence will permit the enmity of men's hearts to break forth against him. Let us "continue in the things which we have learned" and professed to believe: endeavoring to get further acquaintance with "the holy scriptures, which are able to make us wise unto salvation, by faith in Jesus Christ," who is the principal Subject both of the Old and New Testament. And let us learn to reverence the whole Bible, as every sentence in it was "given by inspiration from God, and is profitable" to instruct, reprove, correct, and guide us in the way of peace and holiness. Nothing more can be wanting to render the Christian or the minister perfectly qualified for every service required of him, and "thoroughly furnished unto every good work;" than a complete, believing, experimental, and practical knowledge of the whole scriptures, in their genuine meaning and connexion, and the relation and proportion of one part to another. All religious error springs from ignorance, perversion, or misunderstanding of the scriptures; from overlooking, objecting to, or explaining away some part of them; or from adding men's notions, inventions, superstitions, or new revelations to them, as of equal or superior authority. The way therefore to oppose error is by promoting the solid knowledge of the word of truth, especially by the faithful preaching of the gospel: and the greatest kindness which we can do our children, is to bring them early acquainted with the Bible. Thus we shall do something important, which may tend to preserve religion in the world, when we are removed out of it; and to perpetuate a succession of those, who are "established in the faith," "wise unto salvation, and thoroughly furnished unto every good work." (Notes, John 15:12—16. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) For it is evident, that the pious endeavors of Lois and Eunice, in bringing young Timothy acquainted with the holy scriptures, laid the foundation of all his subsequent eminence and usefulness, in which he was inferior to none but the apostles. It is probable, that, while they were teaching the child to read, and treasure up in his memory, "the Oracles of God," they little thought what a harvest in future life would spring from the seed thus sown. But the scripture warrants high expectations in this respect: and it may fairly be said, that the education of women in useful knowledge and genuine piety, in order that they might be qualified and disposed to instil good principles into the tender minds of children, would have the happiest effects towards reforming mankind, and diffusing the light of the gospel in the world.' Memoir of Rev. Jerem. Newell, annexed to his funeral sermon by the author.

CHAP. IV.

The apostle solemnly charges Timothy, to be diligent and faithful in his ministry, 1,2; as ere long, men "would not endure sound doctrine" 3,4; and as he, Paul, had nearly finished his work, was about to suffer martyrdom, and receive the crown of righteousness, 5—8. He presses Timothy to come to him, and to bring Mark with him, as he was almost left alone; and gives him information, direction, and caution, in several particulars, 9—15. He shows Timothy, how his brethren had forsaken him, and how the Lord had supported him, when called to answer before his persecutors; expressing his confidence in God for the future, 16—18; and he concludes with salutations and benedictions, 19—22.

Note.—These repeated solemn charges of the apostle, to so zealous and faithful a minister as Timothy, most emphatically show, how difficult it is to fill up this important office, in a proper manner, to the end of life, especially in dangerous times. Again he called on his beloved Timothy, by the authority, and as in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus, who was appointed to "judge the living and the dead," at his last glorious appearing to complete the design of his mediatorial kingdom, and to gather his saints into his heavenly kingdom; (Note, 2 Pet. 1:10,11,16—18.) that he should "preach the word" of God as one in earnest, being "instant" and unwearied in his work, "in season, and out of season," at stated times and occasionally; when the opportunity was more favorable, and when it was less so; to large congregations, in private circles, in obscure places, before friends, or enemies, to one, or to ten thousands of hearers; when it might be done with safety and credit, and when it exposed him to hardship, reproach, peril, or loss. Timothy, to whom this exhortation was given, had an infirm constitution; so that this excuse for remissness should not be too readily admitted. (Note, 1 Tim. 5:23.)—In thus preaching the word of God, he was charged to "reprove," with authority, the sins and negligences of professed Christians; to "rebuke" with sharpness those who were guilty of gross evils; and to "exhort," persuade, and beseech his hearers to attend to every part of the divine message, with the obedience of faith. (Notes, 1 Thes. 5:12—15. Tit. 2:15.) In this he was to persevere. "with all long-suffering," though many should prove unruly, ungrateful, or slow to understand his instructions; and he must enforce his exhortations, by explaining, and applying the doctrines of the gospel, in the simplest and most convincing manner. In these important services, he ought to be the more assiduous; as the time was about to come, when professed Christians would not "endure sound doctrine," the faithful salutary truths and practical instructions of the divine word: but, being "led away with divers lusts," would be exasperated or disgusted by it: and desire a doctrine, which gave them no disturbance, or offence, whilst they indulged their several inclinations. They would therefore seek for "teachers after their own lusts;" and they would "heap unto themselves instructors of this stamp;" being dissatisfied without a large number of them, to gratify their love of novelty and variety, and to keep them in countenance in their delusions. Thus "their itching ears" would be humored and pleased; they would "turn them away from the truth," with contempt and disgust, and pay all their attention to cunningly devised fables, and specious heresies. To oppose the progress of this corrupt leaven, which was even then beginning to work, Timothy was called upon to be "vigilant in all things," and to shun all pursuits, which might prevent him from watching against the fallacies, with which Satan and his servants would, in varied ways, endeavor to seduce men from the simplicity of Christ; (Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. Acts 20:29—31. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) to endure cheerfully all the afflictions, to which his zeal and faithfulness might expose him, from false brethren, or avowed enemies; to perform "the work of an evangelist," in the several places to which he might have access; and to "make full proof of his ministry," by trying to the uttermost every method of doing good to the souls of men, in the exercise of all its duties.—Timothy is said in the postscript, to have been 'ordained the first bishop of the church of the Ephesians;' but it seems, to me at least, that the office of an evangelist was superior to that of a diocesan bishop, as exercised in the earliest ages of Christianity. Those, however, who think otherwise, and consider Timothy as a bishop, should not forget the apostle's charge to bishops, to "preach the word, instant in season, out of season." For this too many seem to disregard. The evangelists appear to have been extraordinary assistants to the apostles, exercising great authority in their absence over the several churches which they visited: perhaps when that extraordinary office began to cease in the church, diocesan episcopacy was substituted; but it can only answer the same end in a smaller degree, and in one place: while the missionary part of an Evangelist's office continues essential to the promulgation of the gospel in every age. (*Marg. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—It behoved Timothy, to act with the greater vigilance and fortitude, as the apostle foresaw that he himself should shortly suffer martyrdom, and was even now, as it were, pouring out his blood as a drink offering to the honor of the Lord. (Note, Phil. 2:14—18.) For this approaching event he was ready: and he knew the time was at hand, when he should be removed out of the world, as the sojourner takes up his tent and departs to another place. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—4. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) He considered himself as one who had "finished his ministry," and had only the concluding scene to pass through: and since the time when Christ had chosen him to be his soldier, he was conscious that he had "fought a good fight;" he had valiantly contended against sin, the world, and Satan; he had, at Christ's command, through labors, perils, and sufferings, sought the subversion of "the kingdom of darkness," the deliverance of Satan's captives, and the advancement of the kingdom of Christ: this he had done, with the appointed "weapons of his warfare;" by faithful preaching, a holy example, fervent prayers, and patient sufferings. (Notes, 2:3—7. 2 Cor. 10:1—6. 1 Tim. 6:11—12.) He had "finished his course." He had set out to run the Christian race, "laid aside every weight," "pressed forward" through every obstacle to the mark, and was now about to seize the prize. "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord." (Notes, Acts 20:22—24. 1 Cor. 9:24—27. Phil. 3:12—14. Heb. 12:1. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) "He had also kept the faith" both in his profession, and in the execution of his important ministry. (Notes, 1:13,14. 1 Tim. 6:20,21.) He therefore assuredly expected the "crown of righteousness;" that glory and immortality, which were prepared for all true believers in Christ, according to the measure of their grace, services, and sufferings in his cause. This the apostle knew had been "laid up for him," and he had now little more to do, than to receive and enjoy it. (Notes, Matt. 25:34-40, Col. 1:3-8, 3:1-4, Heb. 10:32-34, 1 Pet. 1:3-5.) "The righteous Judge" would openly award it to him "in that day," to which he constantly called men's attention: as a sinner, indeed, he merited condemnation according to the law; but as a believer, whose faith had been abundantly shown by his works, he was entitled to "the reward of righteousness," according to the gospel. He expected "when absent from the body, to be present with the Lord," and to have abundant and satisfying pre-libations of his complete felicity, in the company of "the spirits of just men made perfect:" but the public declaration of his right to the conqueror's crown, and his admission to the full enjoyment of immortal glory, would be reserved for that day, when Christ shall appear to show his righteousness, as well as his mercy, in rewarding his faithful followers. (Note, 2 Thes. 1:5-10.) Nor was this "crown of righteousness" laid up "for him only," or for other eminent ministers or martyrs; but for all believers in every age and place, even for all "who love Christ's appearing." For they all expect, prepare, and wait for his second coming; they look for their gracious recompense from him at that period; they "endure hardships," and deny themselves the pleasures of the world and give up its interests in hopes of that recompense; they regulate their habitual conduct, as those who believe "that he will come to be their Judge;" they long to see him as he is, to be freed by him from all sin, and to witness his triumph over all his enemies; and, as far as faith and hope exclude anxious doubts of their acceptance, they love the thoughts of his appearing to raise the dead and judge the world. 9 Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me:

11 Only Luke is with me. Take Mark and bring him with thee; for he is profitable to me for the ministry.

12 And Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus.

13 The cloke that I left at Troas, with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments.

Note.—The apostle greatly desired Timothy to come to him, as he was almost solitary in his imprisonment, and had scarcely any with him, whom he could employ in needful services. Demas, of whom he seems before to have judged very favorably, had forsaken him in his perilous situation, "having loved this present world." He had not courage to venture his life, by continuing with the apostle under his persecutions: he loved the world too much to give up all for Christ; and perhaps some prospect of secular advantage offered itself, with which he was caught, and he departed to Thessalonica in pursuit of it. Whether he finally apostatized or not, we cannot certainly tell; but the apostle "stood in doubt of him." (Preface. —Col. 4:14. Notes, 1 John 2:15-17.)—Two other helpers, known to Timothy, were gone to different places, about the work of the Lord with the apostle's approbation; so that "only Luke," his faithful companion in all his sufferings, continued with him. He therefore desired Timothy to bring Mark with him, who was employed in the same parts. Mark had once forsaken the apostle, having too much "loved this present world;" but he had repented, and had now regained his entire confidence, and might be "profitable to him for the ministry" at Rome, as he had been in other places. (Note, Col. 4:9-14. P. O. 7-18.) He also informed Timothy, that "he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus." This has been deemed a decisive proof, that Timothy was not at Ephesus at that time, and indeed it greatly favors that conclusion: but possibly, Tychicus might be sent by another way than the bearer of this epistle, and calling at other places might not arrive till afterwards; and the apostle might mean, that he had sent Tychicus to supply Timothy's place at Ephesus, that he might come to him the sooner.—Among these informations and directions, we find St. Paul desiring Timothy, to bring his cloke to him. If the word means a cloke, or upper garment, (as it seems to do,) which he supposed he might want at the approach of winter, it is a remarkable proof of his poverty to the end of his life, that he should need to send so far for a garment to keep him warm during the remnant of his days! (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:9-13, 2 Cor. 6:3-10, 11:24-27.)—What books and parchments were meant, Timothy would know; but it is in vain for us to conjecture. As Troas was not in the direct road from Ephesus to Rome, this may be urged as a proof that Timothy was not then at Ephesus: but it is not certain, that he might not go by another way, to call upon some of the churches with which he was connected.—These directions favor the opinion, that the apostle had been hurried away, by his persecutors, from these eastern regions; without being allowed leisure, either to accomplish his plans, or to take with him those things which he intended.

Note.—It is not certain, though highly probable, that this was the same Alexander, of whom we have before read. (Acts 19:33. 1 Tim. 1:20.) The apostle, however, was assured that the person spoken of was an incurable apostate, or enemy to Christ. Perhaps, after having been excommunicated, he had openly renounced Christianity, and did every thing he could to stir up persecution against St. Paul and the believers, and to obstruct the success of the gospel: and it is not improbable, that he took an active part in the apostle's being apprehended by his persecutors, and hurried away to Rome. Speaking, however, by the Spirit of prophecy, he denounced this awful sentence on him for a warning to others. We cannot certainly know, who are given up to final obduracy; and must therefore persevere in praying for our enemies and persecutors. (Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. Heb. 6:4—6. 10:26—31. 1 John 5:16—18.)—It is worthy of special notice, that all those passages in the book of Psalms, which, as containing predictions or imprecations on the enemies of David, or rather of Christ the Antitype, are considered even by many pious persons inconsistent with the Christian dispensation, are exactly for substance, the same as the language of the apostle in this place; that is, of one speaking by the Spirit of prophecy. Did the Spirit of God, who spake by David, (Note, 2 Sam. 23:3,4.) dictate to him a vindictive language, contrary to that which he dictated to the apostles of Christ? Is not this supposition highly dishonorable both to the word of God, and to the Spirit which inspired it? (Notes, Deut. 27:15. Ps. 69:22—23. 109:6—20.)—Timothy was moreover warned to beware of the malignant and subtle machinations of this wicked man; as he would do as much to injure him, and withstand his words, as he had done in opposing the apostle and his doctrine.

18 And the Lord shall <sup>h</sup> deliver me from every evil work, <sup>i</sup> and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom; <sup>k</sup> to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Note.—When the apostle was at first, during his second imprisonment, called before the emperor, (or the prefect of the city in his absence, as it is more generally thought,) to make his defence, none of the Christians at Rome had courage to stand by him; but all forsook him to provide for their own safety, even as the apostles had forsaken Christ, when he was apprehended. (Notes, Matt. 26:25—35, 47—56. John 16:31—33. 18:4—9.) The cruel persecutions of the Christians at Rome, under Nero, seem to have preceded the writing of this epistle. Numbers had then been put to death; in the most dreadful manner, or driven from the city; and the rest seem to have been greatly intimidated: so that on this important occasion none were found, who ventured to attend the apostle to the tribunal. This was a very criminal weakness, the effect of unbelief; but the apostle prayed that it "might not be laid to their charge." (Notes, 14, 15. Luke 22: 21—23, 31—34.)—But, though deserted by man, the Lord was graciously pleased to "stand with him," and make him sensible of his presence, favor, and protection: thus giving him strength of faith, courageously to bear witness to the truth before his persecutors; (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) that so "the preaching," even the gospel of Christ, might be fully known by those in authority, and by all present; and that it might, by means of these events, be circulated among the Gentiles, in distant nations with the most overbearing evidence of its divine authority. (Note, 1—5.) Indeed, though his judge was powerful and outrageous; he had been, for that time, "delivered" from him, as out of a lion's mouth. (Notes, Dan. 6:18—23. Heb. 11:32—34.) Perhaps the apostle had in view, that "adversary, who goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour;" and who was not entirely without hope, that the fear of death would induce Paul to renounce the faith; and that he should thus seize upon his soul. (Note, 1 Pet. 5:5,9.) The apostle did not expect to escape martyrdom: but he was confident that "the Lord would deliver him from every evil work," not suffering Satan to prevail against him, to induce him to do any thing inconsistent with the honor of the gospel, or the benefit of his soul; and "that he would preserve him to his heavenly kingdom." (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Gen. 48:16. Matt. 6: 13.) Instead therefore of complaints or despondency, he was ready to ascribe "glory to the Lord for ever and ever;" or to "ages of ages," that is, to eternal ages. "Amen."

Note.—Prisca, or Priscilla, and Aquila were near to the place where Timothy resided: but, as they frequently changed their abode, this does not determine where he then was. (Notes, Acts 18:1—6, 18—23. Rom. 16:3, 4.) The same remark may be made concerning the family of Onesiphorus. (Note, 1:16—18.) The apostle had probably been attended by Erastus and Trophimus, when he last parted with Timothy: but the former abode at Corinth, and the latter was left sick at Miletum; the Lord not seeing good to enable the apostle to work a miracle for his recovery. Having again desired Timothy to come to him before winter, (probably apprehending that he might otherwise come too late to see him,) he concluded with repeated prayers and benedictions.—Surely, every reader must be fully satisfied, from reading the close of this epistle, that St. Peter was not at Rome when it was written: if therefore, he suffered martyrdom, at the same time when the apostle Paul did, according to ancient tradition, he must have arrived at that city, after this epistle had been sent. Timothy accompanied the apostle from Corinth, through Macedonia, probably to Miletus, when he went to Jerusalem before his first imprisonment at Rome. (Acts 20:4—16.) It would therefore have been wholly superfluous to inform him concerning Erastus, if that voyage had been spoken of: and Trophimus accompanied the apostle to Jerusalem. (Acts 21:29.)—Some, indeed, suppose Miletum in Crete, mentioned by Homer, to be intended; but, in that case, St. Paul must have left Trophimus there, at some time subsequent to the voyage towards Rome, in which he suffered shipwreck; for no intimation of such an event is given in that narrative.—Martial, a Roman poet, who lived about this time, mentions Pudens and Claudia: and some suppose, that the same persons are here meant, and that they were converted to Christianity, by the apostle, during his imprisonment.—The Lord Jesus be with thy spirit. (22) What would a well-informed protestant think of a similar prayer, in which the name of any saint, any mere man, or created being was inserted, instead of “the Lord Jesus?” Would it not be considered as an act of idolatry, and that justly? And would not papists bring it as a voucher for their worship of saints, with much plausibility?—But Jesus is “Emmanuel, God with us.” (Notes, Matt. 1:22, 23. 28:19, 20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The importance of the work of ministers, the peculiar temptations to which they are exposed, and the multiplied evil effects of their unfaithfulness or negligence, concur in rendering it needful, most solemnly and repeatedly, to charge the most zealous of them, as “in the presence of God and of the Lord Jesus,” before whom they must shortly appear, to give an account of their stewardship; that “they preach the word, instant in season, out of season,” to few or many, as opportunities offer; like men engaged in the work, who make it their one great business and pleasure; without consulting their own ease, interest, or reputation, or shrinking from hardship, reproach, or persecution; and that they “reprove, rebuke, exhort,” with forbearance and perseverance, with plain instructions, and close application. This is the more indispensable, as the time is indeed now come, when even a large majority of professed Christians “will not endure sound doctrine:” they are offended by the humbling truths of the gospel, or by the heart-searching, distinguishing, practical truths of scripture, which detect their sins, and show the necessity of mortifying their peculiar lusts: and they desire to be soothed and flattered in the indulgence of them, and to have “teachers according to them.” Hence some admire complaisant, ingenious, or eloquent harangues: others prefer curious, speculative disquisitions; or virulent invectives, on men of diverse sects and sentiments. Thus their consciences are quieted, and their self-preference and contempt of others, are humored, together with a curious and captious temper. And because “they have itching ears,” the pruriency of which is not easily quieted, “they heap to themselves teachers,” and always require new voices, new gifts, new notions; till their ears are wholly “turned from the truth, and they are turned unto fables.” This should induce those who love souls, “to watch in all things,” to venture and endure all painful effects of faithfulness, to take every opportunity of preaching the pure gospel; and to “make full proof of their ministry,” that they may do all good in it which they possibly can. In doing this, they should be quickened by the consideration, that their brethren, one after another, are taken away, or laid aside; and that their own term of usefulness will soon expire. In this “manner of life,” however, we may hope to “be ready” for the stroke of death, when the time of our departure arrives: for the diligent Christian, or faithful minister, who is conscious of having acted in good measure consistently with his profession, may with comfort say at the close of his days, “I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me at that day, and to all who love his appearing.” The true believer will give all the praise to divine grace, and expect acceptance only by faith in Christ: but his conduct will prove, that “he hath loved the Lord, who first loved him,” and that he has exercised the faith of God’s elect. (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 1 John 4:19.) Such a man may therefore, amidst poverty, contempt, pain, sickness, and the agonies of death, “rejoice in hope of the glory of God.” But this triumphant language cannot properly be adopted, when most needed by those, who have been negligent, lukewarm, and unfaithful in the service of God, from the time of their supposed conversion. proportion as the duties of a man's place and station are neglected, his evidence of an interest in Christ must be obscured; and uncertainty and discouragement may probably distress his closing scene. (Note, Heb. 4:1,2. P. O. 1—11.)

V. 9—22.

There are various characters in the visible church, and various changes take place among ministers. Some, who have apparently "run well, are hindered," and forsake the Lord and his faithful servants, "loving this present world:" others are recovered from grievous backslidings, and become "profitable for the ministry:" and not a few turn open apostates or virulent opposers, "doing much harm" to the servants of Christ, and greatly withstanding their words; whom "the Lord will reward according to their works." Others bring their characters into doubt, or incur disgrace, by their cowardice in times of danger; and their brethren are called on to pray for them, that "the Lord would not lay that sin to their charge." But a few proceed with diligence and courage in every circumstance: though "no man stands with them, the Lord is with them" to strengthen and comfort them; he "gives them a mouth and wisdom, which all their enemies cannot gainsay;" (Note, Luke 21:12—19, v. 15.) he delivers them from outward dangers and enemies, as long as it is good for them; he "preserves them from the mouth of the lion," which would destroy their souls; and he "keeps them from every evil work even unto his heavenly kingdom." Unnumbered multitudes are now before the throne, giving glory to his name: may we be followers of them; may "the Lord Jesus be with our spirits," to comfort and sanctify them; and may his grace be with all his disciples and ministers in every place! Amen.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

It is remarkable, that Titus, of whom the apostle repeatedly speaks in terms of the highest approbation and most cordial affection in his epistles, is not once mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:1,2,13. 7:5—7. 8:16—24. 12:17—21. Gal. 2:1—5.) Nor is any thing recorded, concerning St. Paul's labors in Crete, now called Candia, a large island in the Mediterranean Sea. It is indeed probable, that the gospel was made known there, at an early period; as there were Cretes present on the day of Pentecost, to witness the stupendous miracles of that glorious season; and to hear the unanswerable sermon of St. Peter, on that wonderful occasion. (Acts 2:11.) If, however, any, who were then converted, on their return home, made known the gospel to their neighbors; the joyful report from them would reach none but the Jews and proselytes. But no information is given us, of what passed in that island, at that time, or afterwards; except as this epistle shows, that St. Paul had labored there. Probably, this was subsequent to his first imprisonment at Rome, and before his second. He seems to have had very great success in his ministry, in that island; but by some means, to have been hurried thence, before he could order the state of the churches, in a regular manner. (Note, 2 Tim. 4:9—13.) He, therefore, left Titus there, to settle the churches in the several cities of the island, according to the apostolical plan in other places.—Tradition, and ecclesiastical records, have made Titus bishop of Crete: and, because so large an island, renowned for a hundred cities, was an extensive charge; some have conferred on him the title of archbishop. But I am by no means convinced, that even this title would not have been a derogation from his real dignity, as an evangelist.—If by saying Timothy and Titus were bishops, the one of Ephesus, the other of Crete, we understand that they took upon them these churches, or dioceses, as their fixed and particular charge, in which they were to preside for the term of life; I believe that Timothy and Titus were not thus bishops: For both Timothy and Titus were evangelists.—Now the work of an Evangelist, says Eusebius, was this, to lay the foundation of churches in barbarous nations, to constitute them pastors; and, having committed to them the cultivating of those new plantations, they passed on to other countries.—As to Titus, he was only left in Crete, "to ordain elders in every city, and to set in order the things that were wanting." Having therefore done that work, he had done all that was assigned him in that station, and therefore St. Paul sends for him the very next year to Nicopolis. Whitby. It is, however, recorded, that he afterwards returned to Crete, and died there, when ninety-four years of age.—Dr. Whitby never doubted, nor does the author of these notes at all doubt, that diocesan episcopacy was generally introduced into the churches, even during the lives of some of the apostles. But the office of an evangelist of old, and that of a true missionary at present, should be considered as perfectly distinct from that of a bishop; and, in some respects, (especially as a general commission, to preach the gospel to the nations,) superior to it.—The postscript states, that the epistle was written from Nicopolis in Macedonia: but, had this been the case, the apostle would have said, "I have determined here to winter," not "there to winter." (3:12.) There were several cities called Nicopolis; and it is not certain which is here meant. The scope and instructions of this epistle, are similar to those of the two preceding.

CHAP. I.

The apostle shows the nature and importance of his office, and salutes Titus, 1—4. He states for what purpose Titus had been left in Crete, 5; and what manner of persons should be ordained to the ministry, 6—9. He exposes the dangerous principles, and the selfishness, of the false teachers, "whose mouths must be stopped," 10, 11; and the had national character of the Cretians, whom Titus must "sharply rebuke" and instruct, that "they may be sound in the faith," 12—6.

Note.—St. Paul was "a servant of God," as he was "an apostle of Christ;" the former was his general character, the latter his special employment. (Note, Rom. 1:1—4.) His apostolical office was "according to the faith of God's elect;" (Notes, John 10:14—18, 26—31, Acts 13:42—48, 2 Thes. 2:13, 14.) and was intended to bring numbers to believe in Christ; and to encourage, increase, and direct the faith of those who already believed. (Note, 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) This he performed, by professing and publicly declaring the "truth which is after godliness." Thus men would understand, receive, and profess those truths, which, being truly believed, bring those, who have been alienated from God, to reverence, trust, love, and worship him, as his obedient children and devoted servants. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) This truth he preached, and his converts acknowledged, amidst manifold trials, "in hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie," (that is, break his word, or deceive those who trust in him,) "had promised before eternal times;" namely, to Christ, as their Surety. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:9.) This purpose, or promise, had been concealed, or but in part revealed, in former ages; but in due time God "had manifested" it, as "his word, through preaching," or by the preaching of the gospel, which had been committed to the apostle, "according to the commandment," or appointment, "of God our Saviour." (Note, 2 Tim. 1:10.) He therefore wrote to Titus, "his genuine son, in that faith," which was common to all true Christians; as he had been converted by his ministry, and trained up under him, for the work of an evangelist: (Marg. Ref. o, p.) and in his behalf he presented his usual devout desires and prayers for "grace, mercy, and peace." (Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Tim. 1:1, 2. 2 Tim. 1:2.)—The expression, "God our Saviour," seems here to relate to the Godhead without distinction of persons; and in some places it refers to the person of the Father, as saving us by his beloved Son. (Notes, 3:4—7. 1 Tim. 1:1, 2.)—Some explain the words rendered, "before the world began," to relate to the promise made to Adam, or to Abraham, before the promulgation of the Mosaic law. But I must think, that the interpretation above given is far more obvious. If indeed Christ be "the Chosen of God," the Surety and Representative of "all who were given to him;" (Notes, John 6:36—40. 17:1—3.) eternal life was promised to him, in behalf of his people, of all who in every age should believe in him, "before the world was;" in consequence of his engagement to become incarnate, and to be obedient even to the death upon the cross. "Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world." Allow this, (and who will venture to deny it?) and then the promise of eternal life to the divine Logos, in behalf of all his people, is clear, and the meaning satisfactory; which, in my judgment at least, the other interpretations by no means are.

Note.—Titus had been left in Crete, “to set in order,” or regulate, “the things which were wanting,” in the government, worship, and discipline of the churches; and especially “to ordain elders in every city,” in which there were many cities in this populous island, and the apostle must have been very successful during his stay there: but probably many had before been converted to Christianity; and there is no ground to conclude that churches were planted in all, or even the greatest part of these cities. The character and qualifications of those eligible to be pastors, (who are called elders and bishops indiscriminately; Notes, Acts 20:17. Phil. 1:1.) correspond to what has before been considered: but it is here added, that they ought to be such, as “had believing children.” They must not be admitted to the pastoral office, who had children grown up; if these did not embrace Christianity, or were accused of riot and licentiousness, or would not be governed, and restrained from scandalous vices. The pastors must be chosen from those, who had for some time professed the gospel, when that could be done: but if their children proved untractable, it would at least be thought, that they did not know how to govern their own families; and the misconduct of the children might reflect disgrace upon the Christian religion, as well as weaken the hands of their parents in the public ministry. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3: 1—7.) For the overseer and steward of God’s household (Note, 1 Cor. 4:1,2.) must be an irreproachable person; and not of an overbearing, self-willed, dogmatical temper, who could not endure to be opposed or contradicted. To the other excellencies of his character, it was needful that he should be a man, who “held fast” in a steady, consistent profession, “the faithful word” of the gospel, according as it had been taught by the apostles; without having perverted or sophisticated it, as many did. (Notes, Job 2:1—3. 23:8—12. Prov. 23:23. 2 Tim. 1:13,14. Rev. 2:12,13,24—28. 3:10,11.) Thus he would be a judicious, experienced, able defender of its truths; competent, by substantial, salutary, and holy doctrine, in every particular, to exhort the disciples to steadfastness in the faith, and to an honorable conduct; and to confute, convince, or silence gainsayers, who oppose or corrupted the truth.

Note.—The qualification last mentioned was the more requisite, as there were in every place, (especially in Crete,) a number of ungovernable “talkers,” and interested “deceivers,” who could not be kept, by any censures or admonitions, from doing great mischief. These were of various descriptions; but the Judaizing teachers were the most busy, unruly, and pernicious; they “subverted whole families,” turning them aside from the simplicity of faith in Christ, to attend on legal ceremonies and human traditions; by “teaching such things as they ought not,” and this “for filthy lucre’s sake,” rather than from mistake or ignorance. (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) For in this manner they humored the pride and prejudices of some, and flattered others in their sins; till they got to be the heads of a party, and found means of enriching themselves. The "mouths," therefore, of these deceivers "must be stopped," by sound doctrine, and conclusive arguments, and testimonies from the word of God; that the tendency of their principles, and the baseness of their designs, might be manifest to every man; and that they might have nothing to say in their own defence. (Marg. Ref.)—The character of the Cretians indeed was so bad, that numbers, both of deceivers and deceived, might be expected in their churches: for Epimenides, a native of Crete, a poet of some reputation, who might be called "a prophet of their own," and who perhaps was deemed a prophet by his countrymen, had said, "The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies;" they had in all ages been notorious for lies, frauds, and impostures; they were like poisonous or ferocious animals, gluttonous and indolent to excess; so that, while a great proportion of their time was employed in eating and drinking, they were rendered torpid and inactive by their excesses, and made no good use of the rest. They united the subtlety of the fox, the venom of the serpent, or the fierceness of wolves and tigers, with the greediness and inactivity of swine.—It is not easy to determine, from what concurrence of circumstances the Cretians obtained so odious and contemptible a national character: but the inspired apostle attested the truth of this testimony; and the effects of it appeared in the conduct of many false teachers and professors of Christianity. Titus was therefore directed "to rebuke them sharply," or with cutting reproofs and awful warnings; "that the churches might be sound in the faith," when the mouths of deceivers were thus stopped, hypocrites detected, and unestablished Christians put upon their guard.—Timothy had been taught to instruct opposers with meekness, and to rebuke with long suffering; (Notes, 1 Tim. 5:1,2. 2 Tim. 2:23—26.) but Titus was ordered to rebuke with sharpness. Some have conjectured, that Timothy was too vehement in his natural spirit, and Titus too timid and pliant: others ascribe the difference to the opposite characters of the persons to be rebuked. But, in fact, Christian meekness is as distant from pusillanimous connivance at sin and error, as from impetuous anger and impatience. This the apostle's conduct, and even that of our Lord himself, fully demonstrate. (Notes, Jam. 3:17,18.)

Note.—In order to the churches in Crete being "sound in the faith," Titus was directed to warn them not to "give heed to Jewish fables," human traditions, or even legal observances, which were then entirely "the commandments of men," who turned "from the truth," and wanted to impose their own observances on Christians. (Notes, Col. 2:20—23. 1 Tim. 1:3, 7. 4:6—10. 6:1—5. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 4:1—5.) These related greatly to distinctions of clean and unclean meats, and the pharisaical inventions of washing the hands, and other frivolous rites of that kind. (Notes, Matt. 15:1—20.) But "to the pure," to the real believer, who had "peace with God through Jesus Christ," and had "his heart purified by faith," all such things were pure in themselves, and used in a holy manner, by the allowance, according to the precepts, and for the glory of God. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) To those, however, "that were defiled" with the guilt and pollution of unrepented sin; and who, through unbelief, remained strangers to the "purging of the conscience with the blood of Christ," "nothing was pure;" for as their hearts were unsanctified, and their consciences erroneous, partial, callous, and unclean; so all their enjoyments and actions, however innocent or good in themselves, were corrupted by pride, avarice, sensuality, and enmity against God. (Note, Prov. 21:4.) Many of these indeed "professed to know God," and to be his people; but in works they denied him, and manifested a disregard to his authority, favor, and indignation: for their conduct in all respects, especially in crucifying Christ, persecuting Christians, and endeavoring to subvert the churches of the Gentiles, proved them to be "abominable and disobedient;" and, as "to every good work, rejected" by God, and given up to judicial blindness.—The unbelieving Jews seem to have been primarily intended; but the Judaizing teachers were purposely included as unbelievers also, though they professed to believe.

few, and that of apostles and evangelists to a very small number. But sinners cannot "serve God," except "according to the faith of his elect" people; and by "acknowledging the truth which is after godliness:" (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:16. 4:6—10.) nor can they be steadfast, in the midst of trials and temptations, except "in hope of eternal life." (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:55—58. Heb. 6:14—20.) This was promised in Christ, "before the world began:" and though he who gave this promise can do all things, yet he "cannot lie," he cannot "deny himself." In his own times he has manifested his "word of truth, by preaching:" and all who are called to this important service, must take heed to publish it "according to the commandment of God our Saviour;" that "the common faith" may thus be conferred on numbers, whom they may rejoice in as their "own children;" and to whom "grace, mercy, and peace, may be given from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour."—When a multitude of captives are brought forth, from the dark dungeon of Satan, into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel; many things will be wanting, and much will require to "be set in order," before their worship and service can be performed in a suitable manner, the best methods used for their edification, and the most effectual defence made against the assaults of their spiritual enemies. Then the presence, counsel, and influence of experienced and faithful servants of God, will be peculiarly useful; especially in respect of the choice and ordination of pastors, to preside over them and teach them. Those to whom this important trust is committed, are bound, as they shall answer for it before God, to appoint "blameless and faithful men" to this stewardship; even such as are of pliant tempers, in respect of their own humors and interests, but firm in the cause of God; peaceable, sober, temperate men; superior to the grovelling love of "filthy lucre;" "lovers of hospitality and of good men;" just and holy; prudent managers of domestic concerns; attentive to relative duties; constant and bold, in professing the truth as taught in the word of God; and "able by sound doctrine to exhort and to convince gainsayers."—It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers to educate their children with diligence and piety, and to rule them with prudence and firmness: and the children of ministers should consider what a dreadful account must be rendered by them, if their unbelief, riot, and unruly behavior bring an imputation on the character of their fathers, interfere with their usefulness, and thus occasion the ruin of immortal souls.

V. 10—16.

In all ages, there have been "unruly and vain talkers and deceivers," by whom Satan sows tares in the Lord's field: and this should teach and induce the servants of God, to be vigilant and diligent, that they may counteract the enemy. For unless the "mouths of such men be stopped," they will "subvert whole families" of hopeful persons, and teach the most pernicious doctrines "for filthy lucre's sake." To prevent this mischief is the most difficult part of a minister's work: and his wisdom must especially be shown, in discerning men's characters; distinguishing between the weak and the wicked; and knowing when to exhort with gentleness, and when to "rebuke with sharpness, that men may be sound in the faith." For though there are national differences of character, yet "the heart" of man, in every time and place, is "deceitful and desperately wicked;" and some need the gentlest guidance, others must be exposed, and warned with decided severity; or they will "turn men away from the faith to fables" and human inventions, yea diabolical delusions.—The true Christian learns to exercise his liberty in a pure and holy manner; all things are "pure to him," and grace teaches him "to eat, and to drink, and to do all to the glory of God;" and when he fails, he has humble recourse to the purifying blood and sanctifying grace of Christ. But unbelievers are "defiled in their minds and consciences;" their ordinary actions and religious duties are unclean to them: whether they riot in licentiousness, as if that were liberty; or whether they enslave themselves to superstitious observances. For alas! numbers, of various descriptions, "profess to know God, but in works deny him; being abominable, disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate." But at last "the tree will be known by its fruit; and every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down and cast into the fire."

CHAP. II.

The apostle directs Titus to instruct the people in their several relative duties, for the honor of the gospel; to exemplify them in his own conduct, and to take heed to his doctrine, 1—8; to teach servants to be obedient and upright, that "in all things they may align the doctrine of God our Saviour," 9, 10. He enforces his exhortations, by showing the holy tendency and efficacy of the gospel, and charges Titus to act with authority and firmness, 11—15.

Note.—To mark the difference between false teachers, and the servants of Christ, the apostle exhorted Titus to "speak such things as became sound doctrine;" or the salutary, healing truths of the gospel, from which all the motives and encouragements to holy obedience must be deduced: and it "became sound doctrine," that preachers should inculcate on their hearers the practice of their various duties, from evangelical motives. Thus they ought to teach "the aged men to be sober," serious, prudent, vigilant, "grave, temperate" in every kind of indulgence, and "sound in faith," steadfast in the profession of faith in Christ; "in charity," or love to him and their brethren, and "in patience and perseverance," amidst trials and persecutions. It does not appear, that the elders or pastors of the church were exclusively intended. The original word is different from that translated elders, and signifies men advanced in years. The apostle had before spoken of the elders. (Note, 1:5—9.)

Note.—Aged women also (whether employed as deaconesses by the church or not,) should be instructed to act consistently with their sacred character, as professedly a part of the spiritual priesthood, and with that devotedness to God which it implied. (Note, 1 Tim. 2:8—10.) They should be warned against speaking slanders, or calumnies; a sin to which human nature is peculiarly prone, and to which the natural character of the Cretians must give them an additional propensity. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:8—13.) They must not be “enslaved to much wine:” some of them might have been accustomed to this, when heathens; and it would need great self-denial to acquire victory over the habit, and liberty from the thralldom, of this infatuating vice. They were likewise required to be “teachers of good things,” in their families, and to their juniors: that so they might be employed, in exhorting “the younger women to be sober” and prudent, without levity or vanity; affectionate to their husbands and children, and taking pleasure in the duties of wives and mothers; discreetly avoiding “all appearance of evil,” or ground of suspicion, as well as every actual violation of conjugal fidelity. They must also teach them to be “keepers at home,” and diligent in managing their domestic affairs; not delighting to gad abroad, nor yet loitering away their time at home; to be good or kind to all around them; “and obedient to their own husbands,” even if they were not Christians, and if they in many things behaved improperly to them: for this would frequently be the case. (Notes, Eph. 5:22—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—6.) These things must be attended to, “that the word of God might not be blasphemed,” or evil spoken of, among the Gentiles, through any improper conduct of Christians in relative life. (Notes, 7, 8. Rom. 2:17—24. 1 Tim. 5:13—15. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 2:13—17. 3:13—16.)—Young men also must “be sober-minded,” and act in a prudent and considerate manner: avoiding all youthful lusts and vanities, and attending to their several duties in the fear of God. (Note, 2 Tim. 2:20—22.)

Note.—It was especially incumbent on Titus to give, in his own conduct, a pattern of all those “good works” to which he exhorted others, that they might have his example for a comment on his instructions. (Notes, 2 Thes. 3:6—9. 1 Tim. 4:11—16. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) In his doctrine or public instruction also, he should take care to preserve “uncorruptness,” not admitting any of those additions, by which the holy nature and efficacy of divine truth might be altered; “gravity,” avoiding every thing ludicrous, all affectation of wit, or whatever did not consist with the solemnity, becoming the great concerns of God and eternity; and “sincerity,” or an upright, evident, and single aim to the glory of God and the good of souls; without seeking applause or worldly advantage, or appearing to have any selfish designs in what he did. He must also use “sound speech, that could not be condemned” as erroneous, ambiguous, unintelligible, or of bad tendency: that, divine truth being thus stated, in plain, convincing, and scriptural language, “those who were of a contrary part,” whether heathens or heretics, might find nothing weak, frivolous, or unguarded, to object against; but that such as attempted to find fault with what was so evidently good and beneficial, might be put to shame, “having no evil thing to say of him.”

Note.—(Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) In general, servants must be exhorted to be “obedient to their own masters,” and to make it their constant endeavor to please them well, and give them full satisfaction, in every part of their conduct: and, in particular, they must not “answer again,” with rudeness or warmth, when found fault with, even though they had not been to blame; but rather bear an unmerited rebuke, than engage in altercations and give further offence, or incur the charge of impertinence. They ought also scrupulously to avoid “purloining,” or pilfering, in the absence of their masters, such things as were put under their care, or within their reach; either to apply them to their own use, or to bestow them on their companions. This species of stealing was so common among the heathen servants, that the same word sometimes signifies a slave, which is generally rendered a thief: and it is to be apprehended that it is extremely common, even among servants who are called Christians; few of whom are scrupulous about using or disposing of the provisions of the family, contrary to the intentions and interests of their masters: nay, frequently they affect the praise and pride of generosity, by giving away the property of their masters to dishonest hangers on, who acknowledge the obligation by reciprocal favors. But Christian servants must be taught strict honesty in these things, and “to show all good fidelity,” by uprightly using or saving whatever was intrusted to them, according to the will of their masters; being satisfied with the provision allotted them, and not countenancing any degree of waste or embezzlement. Thus they must “adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things:” for though the doctrine of salvation from the abundant mercy of God the Father, through the person and righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Emmanuel, and by faith in him, and by the regeneration and sanctification of the Holy Spirit, by faith in the divine Saviour, had unspeakable glory and beauty in it, in the view of all the redeemed, and of the holy angels; (Notes, Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 5:8—14.) yet unconverted men could not discern this, but rather deemed it foolish, absurd, and pernicious: and the misconduct of professed Christians would confirm them in this ruinous prejudice. On the other hand, honesty, fidelity, industry, a peaceable obliging conduct, and exact conscientiousness, in servants professing the gospel, would put an ornament and a lustre on the doctrine, in the view of unbelievers. This would, when the apostle wrote, peculiarly attract the notice even of heathen masters; such an argument of its excellency would be intelligible to them; it would appeal to their hearts and consciences; and they would thus be rendered more favorable to the truth, and might be induced at length to hear and embrace it. The same observation may be equally applied to every other instance of relative and social good behavior.

Note.—The nature of Christianity required, that such exhortations as have been considered should be given and observed: for “the grace of God which bringeth salvation,” or the saving grace of God, and his abundant love to lost sinners, as discovered in the gospel of Christ, “had appeared to all men,” or had been illustriously displayed before Jews and Gentiles, of every rank and character, without exception; and the preachers were directed to preach to all, and invite all, to whom they could obtain access. This doctrine, in the most energetic manner, taught all who heard it, “to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts;” as it exhibited, in the clearest light, the holiness and justice of God, the obligations and requirements of his perfect law, the evil of sin, the future state of retributions, the lost condition of fallen man, his need of mercy and grace, and the encouragements given him, to “repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance.” It taught men, that they ought to deny ungodliness; showed them how they might be enabled to do it, and supplied the most powerful motives to set about it. Moreover, when this “saving grace” of God took possession of the heart in regeneration; the new nature, under the influences of the Holy Spirit, inwardly and efficaciously taught men the same things; “the law was written in their minds;” while new and more constraining motives to obedience were drawn from the obligations of redeeming love, the comforts of communion with God, and the hope of heavenly felicity.—Thus in every age, the gospel teaches men outwardly in general, and grace inwardly teaches believers in particular, “to deny ungodliness;” to refuse compliance with every suggestion from whatever quarter, to neglect God and their duty to him, or to treat him with irreverence, ingratitude, contempt, and enmity; and constantly to resist and counteract that principle of alienation from God, whence all ‘dola-

try, infidelity, impiety, and irreligion, in thought, word and deed, originate. It teaches them also to "deny worldly lusts," refusing to gratify those impetuous, carnal, and selfish desires of the human heart, which influence men to seek happiness from the world, and not from God; such as pride, ambition, avarice, sensuality, wrath, malice, and envy; whence spring all kinds of contentions, wars, cruelties, injustice, frauds, oppressions, murders, intemperance, and licentiousness, which disturb, desolate, and plague the earth. These "the saving grace of God" teaches us constantly and resolutely to deny, resist, and mortify; refusing them every kind of indulgence, opposing their first risings in the heart, and avoiding all temptations to them. (Notes, Rom. 6:1,2. Gal. 2:17-21. 5:19-26. 6:11-14. 1 Pet. 4:1-5.)—The holy law of God, indeed, teaches men to love God and each other: but, requiring perfect obedience, it gives sinners neither injunction nor encouragement to repentance, and to "works meet for repentance," or to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts. It shuts them up under sin, and leaves them in that state, without hope or help: for every command, counsel, and encouragement to a sinner, properly belongs not to the law, but to "the saving grace of God," according to the gospel. (Note, Gal. 3:6-14,19-22.)—This grace inwardly and efficaciously teaches all who receive it, as the necessary effect of "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts," "to live soberly," in the conscientious government of every appetite and passion; refraining from every unlawful and inexpedient indulgence, and from whatever can be injurious to themselves or others, in body or soul, or in respect of social and relative comfort. It teaches them also "to live righteously," according to the requirements of universal justice, to all ranks and orders of men; in all commercial transactions and relative duties, to superiors, equals, and inferiors; in a conscientious, faithful, and upright submission and service to rulers and masters, parents, and husbands; in an equitable and humane treatment of servants, laborers, and poor dependants; in a meek and forgiving conduct towards enemies; in exact truth, sincerity, and fidelity, respecting their conversation, professions, promises, and engagements; in a compassionate, kind, and liberal behavior to the poor, afflicted, and distressed; and in a constant endeavor to promote the peace, comfort, and happiness, temporal and eternal, of all men, according to their ability and opportunity. In like manner, it teaches all who partake of it, to live "godly," or piously, attending on all the ordinances of God with reverent devotion, as means of grace, and as rendering him the tribute of adoration, praise, and gratitude due to his name; worshipping him in secret, in the family, and in public; hallowing his day, reverencing and studying his word, honoring his name, fearing, believing, loving, submitting to, obeying, and delighting in God, according to the requirements of his holy law; and expressing these affections of the soul, in a constant desire and aim to please and glorify him. The grace of God taught and still teaches men to live after this manner, "in this present world," notwithstanding all its snares, temptations, and corrupt examples, and the ill usage to be expected by those, "who will live godly in Christ Jesus;" and notwithstanding the remaining power of sin in the heart, with all the manifold infirmities and hindrances, of which the believer is conscious.

13 Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ;

Note.—In this tenor of conduct, the gospel teaches believers to persevere; "looking for that blessed hope," or object of hope, which the promises of the gospel lead them to expect, at the end of their course of obedient faith; and waiting, in patient preparation, for "the appearing of the glory of the great God, even of our Saviour Jesus Christ," to judge the world, and perfect the salvation of his people. The invisible God, the divine Essence, "which no man hath seen or can see," will not be manifested at that solemn period; (Notes, John 1:18. 1 Tim. 6:13-16.) but Christ will be displayed, "in his own glory," as Mediator, "and in the glory of the Father;" and thus will appear "the glory of the great God, even of our Saviour Jesus Christ;" when, through his human nature, he shall exercise omnipotence, omniscience, and all the perfections of the Godhead, in assigning, by a single word, the everlasting state of unnumbered millions; while none shall be able to withstand the power, or object to the justice, of that awful decision. deliver us from the dominion and pollution of all sinful propensities; (Note, Ps. 130:7,8.) and that he might "purify us," by his word and Spirit, and by his concurring providential dispensations, from all remains of defilement, that we might be devoted to him, as our Lord and God, be his worshippers and servants, live to his glory, and so recommend his salvation; as "a peculiar people," his property, not only as creatures, but as redeemed sinners, and as having voluntarily devoted ourselves to him. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

It "becomes sound doctrine," and it is indispensably incumbent on ministers, to teach all Christians their several relative duties, in connexion with evangelical principles.—"Aged men and women," "professing godliness," are peculiarly called on to "be sober, grave, temperate, stable, sound in faith, love, and patience;" and less allowance will be made for them, than for others, if they indulge in levity, vanity, and intemperance; or are betrayed into rashness, instability, or selfishness.—In proportion as Christians advance in years, they are supposed to understand better what behavior, appearance, attire, and language "become holiness;" they will have no need to watch against censoriousness and peevishness; and they should be taught to seek comfort, under the decays of nature, from a nearer communion with God; and not from "much wine," which produces a most abject and disgraceful slavery, or from any inexpedient indulgence. (Note, Eph. 5:15—20.)—The excellence of true religion is manifested, when every one is taught and induced by it to attend on the duties of their several situations; and elderly persons are under strong obligations to be teachers of good things to their juniors, by word and deed. Thus aged and pious women may, with peculiar propriety, instruct young women in their duties, as wives and mothers, "teaching them to be sober, to love their husbands and children," and to show their love in a proper behavior toward them; "to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home," diligent in their domestic employments, and "obedient to their own husbands;" and to persevere in this useful and honorable conduct, though they should meet with trials, hardships, or unkind usage; "that the word of God may not be blasphemed."—"Young men also must be exhorted to be sober-minded;" and to copy the seriousness, piety, purity, discretion, and temperance of those who are grown old in the service of Christ: and not the levity, excess, and folly of such, as are preparing themselves anguish for riper years, or "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath."—But those who would with energy inculcate these practical subjects, must "in all things show themselves patterns of good works;" or else the most scriptural admonitions will be disregarded, or expounded by their own conduct.—Uncorrupt doctrine, even "the word of the truth of the gospel," should be manifestly made the basis of practical exhortations; which ought to be delivered with gravity, as well as with sincerity; and wholly remote from all levity, or affectation of wit and humor; that "sound speech, which cannot be condemned," may put to shame and silence captious and malicious opposers. (Note, 1 Cor. 14:20—25. P. O. 12—25.)—As no rank in the community raises men above the minister's admonition, so none places them beneath his attention. The conduct of the meanest servant may disgrace, or it may "adorn, the doctrine of God our Saviour." The latter will be the happy effect, when servants, professing that doctrine, are "obedient to their masters," obliging in all things, "not answering again, not purloining, but showing all good fidelity." In this manner, they may acceptably and effectually recommend the gospel, and perhaps be instrumental to the salvation of their superiors. In these, and in all other things, it behoves every professed Christian to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour;" which alone can ensure that doctrine due respect in this evil world, or favorably attract the attention of those who "are without."

V. 11—15.

The divine law teaches us godliness, righteousness, temperance, and universal holiness: but the "grace of God which bringeth salvation," alone "teaches us" sinners "to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live "soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." How greatly then are they mistaken, who would inculcate these practical subjects, without leading men's attention primarily to the mercy and grace of God in Christ, for instruction, motives, help, and encouragement: thus vainly expecting good fruit from the ungrafted crab-stock! As this "saving grace of our God hath appeared to all men," and to us in particular, "by the word of truth;" let us inquire, whether our whole dependence be placed upon that grace, which saves the lost, pardons the guilty, and sanctifies the unclean: and whether we have inwardly been taught by it, as truly penitent, to hate, forsake, and "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Whether we are daily mortifying our sins, following after holiness, and practising all our duties to God and man, in expectation that "Christ will come to be our Judge;" and patiently continuing in well-doing, while we look for "that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ," to "number us with his saints in glory everlasting."—If we indeed believe, that Emmanuel "gave himself for us, to redeem" us from deserved and eternal misery, that he might also deliver us from Satan, and from "all iniquity, and purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works;" we can want no further inducement to any kind or degree of self-denying obedience; provided we duly estimate his love, our obligations, and the assurance given us of all sufficient help, and every needful good. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 1 Pet. 1:17—22.) The more evidently we are "redeemed from all iniquity, and purified" unto Christ "as a peculiar people, zealous of good works;" the clearer will our evidence be of an interest in his righteousness and atonement; and the brighter our hope of eternal felicity; and the further we are removed from boasting, or trusting in imaginary good works, that we may glory in Christ alone; the more zealous shall we become, of abounding in real good works, performed in an upright, humble, believing manner, to the glory of our Lord, and the benefit of his people, and of mankind. (Note, 3:8.) May all ministers speak these things decidedly, enforce them with earnestness, and "rebuke" opposers and perverters of the gospel, and also negligent Christians, "with all authority;" and may their doctrine and example secure them from the contempt of all men, except that of the avowed despisers of Christ and his salvation!

CHAP. III.

The apostle inculcates on Christians, subjection to rulers, and good behavior to all men, 1, 2; from the consideration of their own sinfulness and their salvation by God's mercy through Christ, 3—5. He cautions Titus to avoid disputes; and shows him how to deal with heretics, 9—11; and, directing him to meet him at Nicopolis, and giving instructions about other matters, 12—14, he concludes with salutations, 15.

Note.—(Notes, Matt. 22:15—22. Rom. 13:1—7. 1 Tim. 2:1,2. 1 Pet. 2:13—17.) Titus was further instructed, to remind the Cretians, by reiterated exhortations, to obey those "principalities and powers," or civil governors, whom Providence had placed over them; and even the inferior magistrates appointed by them. These were idolaters, and generally oppressive and injurious: yet the apostle, during his short abode in Crete, had taught an unreserved subjection to them, except in matters of conscience towards God. But, as the Cretians would be apt to forget his admonitions, they were to be "stirred up in the way of remembrance;" that so no disgrace might be brought on the gospel, by the turbulent spirits and conduct of professed Christians.—They must also be directed "to be ready to every good work," showing a willing mind for any kind action, even to their heathen neighbors: not reviling or slandering any man, nor even propagating disadvantageous reports when true, unless there were a necessity: not "brawling," or wrangling with acrimony and vehemence, even against those who injured them; but acting with gentleness and meekness to all men.

ed them by an argument, which related to the state of Christians in general, before their conversion. (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Eph. 2:1—3. 1 Pet. 4:1—5.) Including himself, Titus, and all other Christians, among those in Crete, (for this is undeniably the plain meaning of the passage,) he argued, that they ought to bear with and be kind to their enemies, and patiently to endure their perverseness and injustice: for they themselves had experienced far greater patience and kindness from God; as “they had sometime;” that is, before their conversion, “been foolish,” ignorant of God, of themselves, and of divine truth; and had perversely preferred worldly things to true religion. In different ways they all had been “disobedient” to God, in their habitual conduct, and to those whom God had placed over them; having been “deceived,” by Satan and their own hearts, and led to wander out of the right way. They had been “slaves to divers lusts, and” the love of worldly “pleasures;” some being under the power of one sinful passion, some of another. (Notes, Rom. 6:12—20.) They had also lived “in malice and envy:” from the various competitions, animosities, and resentments, to which their eager pursuit of worldly objects, and the pride of their hearts gave rise. Thus they had been “hateful” in their disposition and conduct in the sight of God; “and had hated one another,” especially in the reciprocal contempt and enmity, borne by the Jews and Gentiles against each other: and by the hatred of the persecutors against the persecuted. (Notes, 1 John 3:11—15.)

7 That, <sup>a</sup> being justified by his grace, we should be <sup>b</sup> made heirs according to the <sup>c</sup> hope of eternal life.

Note.—God might justly have left even the apostle and Titus, with their brethren and fellow laborers, to perish in their sins; as, before their conversion, they had not only deserved it, but had been “vessels of wrath fitted for destruction.” (Note, Rom. 9:22,23.) Yet, he had not only spared them, but effected a most blessed change in their state and character. For the kindness and philanthropy of God, (his love to sinful men, while he left sinning angels to perish,) had given them ground to call him “God our Saviour;” as he had purposed, planned, and effected salvation for mankind, by giving his only Son to be their Redeemer. (Notes, 1:1—4. 2:13. Is. 12:1—3. 45:14—22.) After this “love of God to man” had been displayed in the incarnation, obedience, death, and resurrection of the eternal Son of God, and by the preaching of the gospel; he had also brought the apostle and his brethren to partake of the salvation: not through the merit or efficacy of “works of righteousness, which they had done,” of whatever kind, or in any degree; but “according to his” unmerited and plenteous “mercy,” and compassionate good-will to them; and by “the washing of regeneration,” that “new birth of the Spirit,” of which “the laver” of baptism was the sacramental sign, but nothing more. (Notes, John 3:3—8. Eph. 2:4—10. 1 Pet. 3:19—22.) This not only washed the heart from the prevailing love and pollution of sin, but made way for “the renewal” of the soul to the divine image by the power of the Holy Spirit; (Notes, Rom. 12:2. Eph. 4:22—24. Col. 3:7—11.) which God the Father had richly and abundantly poured forth upon them, in all the variety of its gifts, graces, and consolations, “through Jesus Christ our Saviour.” His ransom had purchased, and his mediation had obtained this inestimable gift for sinners, in order to impart salvation to their souls. Thus, being brought to repent, and believe in the Son of God, they had been “justified by his grace,” without any of their own merits; (Note, Rom. 3:21—26. 5:1,2.) and so they became the adopted children and heirs of God, “according to the hope of eternal life,” which his promise had taught them to entertain. (Notes, 1:1—4. Rom. 5:1—5. 8:24—27. vv. 24,25. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 1 John 5:11,12.) Seeing then all their hopes and privileges had been conferred upon them, wholly by the mercy of God, contrary to all their own deserts; it was highly proper for them to be “followers of God,” in their conduct towards their brethren and neighbors.—The miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit are not so much as alluded to in this place: and nothing induces more confusion and perplexity into the expositions given of the scripture by commentators of different descriptions, than the neglect of distinguishing between those communications which constituted men prophets or apostles, and those which were, still are, and ever must be, indispensably necessary to render them true Christians.—The expression, “shed” or poured “on us,” in this manifest allusion to the sacrament of baptism, may properly be noted, as an intimation that the pouring of water on any person, “in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit,” is baptism, equally with immersion. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—“The saying,” which the apostle had just delivered, concerning salvation to sinners, from the mercy of God in Christ, through regeneration, by faith, and gratuitous justification of grace, “was faithful;” and the doctrines which he had stated, as well as the exhortations before given, (for both seem to be referred to,) he would have Titus insist upon, with constancy and without wavering; in order that “those who had believed in God,” and trusted in his mercy, grace, truth, and power, through Jesus Christ, might be rendered “careful to maintain,” or to stand foremost in the practice of good works; being influenced by love and gratitude, and encouraged by the promises of the gospel to abound in them. For though the things before stated in various practical admonitions, could not in any degree justify sinners before God; they were “good” in themselves, and “profitable to men,” in respect of their temporal and eternal interests, both to those who performed them, and to others. (Notes, Job 22:1—4. Ps. 16:2,3. 2 Cor. 9:12—15.)

9 But <sup>i</sup> avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are <sup>k</sup> unprofitable and vain.

Note.—It was incumbent on Titus, to insist on the grand peculiarities of the gospel, and by all means to avoid frivolous and foolish questions, or subtle nice distinctions and “genealogies,” to which the Jews were attached, as if men were the better in the sight of God for being descended from the patriarchs. These matters, and the contests and angry disputes of the Jewish teachers, about the Mosaic law, and the obligations of its ceremonies, were utterly vain under the Christian dispensation; and only amused men with such speculations, as took them off from the great doctrines and duties of Christianity.—The contrast between those things which “are good and profitable to men” (8), and “those which are unprofitable and vain,” is worthy of observation. 11 Knowing that he that is such <sup>o</sup> is subverted, and sinneth, <sup>p</sup> being condemned of himself.

Note.—A heretic, in St. Paul’s sense, seems to denote a professed Christian, who obstinately denies and opposes some fundamental doctrine of the gospel, as taught by the apostles; especially if he were earnest to propagate his notions, from a vain desire of being the head of a party, and so made divisions in the church. (Note, Gal. 5:19—21.) Titus was therefore directed to admonish the heretic once and again; showing him the error and evil tendency of his principles, and their corrupt source; warning him of his guilt and danger, and exhorting him to retract. If this failed of effect, he ought afterwards to reject him, as an excommunicated person: as his dangerous errors, and his pertinacious adherence to them, evinced him “to be subverted,” or turned aside from Christ, the Foundation of the church, by the artifices of Satan; that his mistakes arose not from unavoidable ignorance, but from proud and carnal prejudices, so that he sinned in them; and that “he was condemned of himself,” as his avowal of such heresies rendered further proof against him unnecessary. He was therefore not to be considered as a Christian, or allowed to continue in the communion of the church. The scriptures referred to in the margin (Marg. Ref. p.) show, that when a man’s own words suffice for his condemnation, without further evidence, he may be said to be “condemned of himself;” nor does any great difficulty appear in this much disputed text, except in explaining it in a manner consistent with the systems of contending zealots.—In subordinate matters the apostle inculcated mutual forbearance; but all his epistles show, that he supposed some errors to be fundamental, and absolutely inconsistent with faith in Christ. For pertinaciously maintaining these errors, men ought to be excommunicated, as much as for gross immoralities: and were things restored to their primitive state in the church of Christ, there can be no doubt, that those who deny the ruined estate of man by nature, the Deity of Christ, the real atonement of his death, justification by faith in the merits of Christ, of grace and not of works; the need of sanctification by the Holy Spirit, and of obedience to God’s commandments, as the effect and evidence of justifying faith, with other doctrines of similar importance, would, after proper admonition, be rejected by the pastors of the church, and excluded from the communion of believers. No doubt would remain in their minds, that such heretics were subverted and sinned; and their profession of tenets so destructive of Christianity, would be deemed a kind of “self-condemnation;” without considering them as less sincere in opposing the truth, than Saul of Tarsus was. They would not judge them proper persons to associate with those who believed the doctrines of Christianity: but yet they would not do them any injury in their temporal concerns, or refuse to aid them in distress; or neglect to pray for “God to give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth." The connexion, which has so long subsisted, between excommunication and persecution, has aided in giving occasion to a latitudinarian candor, and a laxity of discipline, to associate with men's ideas of toleration. But the fullest toleration does not imply, that all opinions should be regarded as alike right or probable: nor does excommunication imply, that any alteration should be made in men's civil circumstances. (Notes, Matt. 18:15—18. 1 Cor. 5:1—5,9—13. 2 John 7—11. Rev. 2:20—23.) Some learned and ingenious men have indeed at length discovered that it is no sin to treat the word of God with neglect, contempt, or proud opposition; and that it is of little consequence what doctrines men believe! No wonder then, that they cannot explain the scripture into an agreement with these tenets; or bring the word of God to declare its own insignificance. But those who believe, that "men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil," and treat the truth of God as a lie, because it opposes their pride or lusts, will not find much difficulty in understanding, why such heretics should be separated from the society of believers: and they will chiefly lament, that it is not more generally practised, and more easily practicable; seeing it is evident, "that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," in many churches which once seemed to flourish. (Notes, Lev. 13:40—44. Rom. 16:17—20. 1 Tim. 1:18—20. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 2 Pet. 2:1—3. 1 John 5:9,10.)

It is in vain to seek the meaning of this word from profane writers, or from etymology; the New Testament itself must explain it.—Now it is manifest, that there were important differences in opinion, between the Pharisees and Sadducees, as well as a division into sects: and, it appears to me, that fundamental errors in doctrine, rather than divisions into parties, are intended, when heresies are mentioned, by the sacred writers.—Reject.] Ἡρετικὸν. 1 Tim. 4:7. Note.—There were several cities called Nicopolis, (the city of victory), especially one in Macedonia, and another in Epirus, and it is not certain which was here meant: but it hence appears that St. Paul was at this time at liberty. Had he written from Nicopolis, as the spurious postscript asserts, he would have said, "I have determined here to winter."—He purposed to send Artemas, or Tychicus, to inform Titus, when to meet him there; and probably to supply his place in Crete: and he desired him to come without delay. But he was required to bring Zenas, (who was either a converted Jewish doctor of the law, or one who had been a Roman lawyer,) and Apollos, who seems to have been then in Crete: and he was studiously to help them, that by the kindness of the churches, their wants and travelling expenses might be supplied. Titus was also directed to remind the immediate friends of the apostle, and especially the ministers, that they should "learn to maintain," or to stand forward and distinguish themselves, in the practice of good works, for these and such like useful purposes; that they might not be unfruitful, but might set a good example to the new converts.—Some explain the words to mean, that they should learn and labor in "useful trades," which would enable them, though no emoluments were annexed to their office, to assist their brethren, and so in this respect not to be unfruitful. (Marg. Ref.)—With this admonition, and the customary salutations and benedictions, he concluded the epistle.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It has at all times been necessary, to remind Christians "to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates," and "to submit to one another in the fear of God;" (Notes, Eph. 5:21. 1 Pet. 5:5—7.) but it is peculiarly so at present, when most valuable privileges and liberties in this favored land, which ought to have rendered cheerful subjection and peaceable obedience universal, among all who "name the name of Christ," have given occasion to a contrary spirit and conduct in numbers, who seem to forget, that most express precepts to this effect are found in the scriptures. But real religion, in proportion as it prevails, will render believers quiet subjects, as well as good neighbors and relations, and "ready to every good work:" it will repress every turbulent and censorious temper, and restrain them from "speaking evil" of others, and from reviling and wrangling; and it will teach them to be gentle and meek to all men. These dispositions, and this conduct, are the genuine effects of a deep conviction of our own guilt, united with a believing and experimental knowledge of the salvation of the gospel.—We shall not, when really humbled and enlightened, disdain or be wearied out by the misconduct of the most unreasonable enemies; because we shall well remember, that we ourselves were formerly "foolish, disobedient, and deceived, slaves to divers" base lusts, and a fondness for carnal pleasures; "that we lived in malice and envy," and in short were hateful to God, and disposed to hate one another, and thus "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction," till divine grace effected the blessed change. Let us then often contemplate the discoveries, which have been made of the "kindness and love of God our Saviour," towards our fallen apostate race, in "giving his Son to be the propitiation for our sins;" his patience in sparing us, during the years of our foolishness and rebellion; his goodness in sending us the word of salvation; and, to crown the whole, his mercy in causing us to partake of the "washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he poured upon" our souls, of his plenteous grace, through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Surely we know that none of these things were procured "by works of righteousness which we had done;" and that we are "justified freely by his grace, and so made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Having been therefore brought into a state of safety, and made partakers of a joyful hope, by the mercy of God the Father, through the redemption of his incarnate Son, and by the new creation of the Holy Spirit; it certainly behoves us to "take the lead in every good work," by which we can glorify God our Saviour, or benefit mankind. (Note, Phil. 4:8, 9.) Ministers should frequently and earnestly insist upon these "faithful sayings," and "affirm these things constantly;" and show the tendency of the truths of the gospel to holiness of life: and Christians should be ambitious of exceeding all other men in every good thing, for the honor of the truth through which they are saved. (Note, 2:14.)

V. 9—15.

Attending to "the good and profitable" things before inculcated, we should learn to avoid "foolish questions" and contentious disputations, which "are unprofitable and vain." But, though we must not strive about words, or magnify every difference of opinion into a "damnable heresy;" yet we should carefully watch against fundamental errors, which are inconsistent with "the life of faith in the Son of God," and of grateful obedience to him. Many are subverted by heretics; we should therefore "withdraw from them," if they neglect proper admonitions; and though they should not be separated from the communion of believers here; yet, continuing impenitent, they will at last be rejected by the omniscient Judge of all men. Whatever Christians "find to do," they should attend on it diligently: (Note, Ec. 9:10.) they ought to be ever ready to help one another; and to prevent and relieve the wants of those who are laboring to promote the gospel. (Note, 3 John 5—8. P. O. 1—8.) Those who exhort others to such good works, must learn to maintain them in their own conduct; and, on proper occasions, to set a decided and conspicuous example. Then they will not be unfruitful in the knowledge of Christ; mutual love as the fruit of faith will be increased; and "the grace of our Lord will be with them all."

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

PHILEMON seems to have been a Christian of some eminence, residing at Colossè, (Note, 1,2.—Col. 4:9,17.) who had been converted under St. Paul's ministry (19); perhaps during his abode at Ephesus. (Acts 19:10.)—When the apostle was imprisoned at Rome, Onesimus, a slave of Philemon, having, as it is generally thought, been guilty of some dishonesty, left his master and fled to that city, though at the distance of several hundred miles. When he came thither, curiosity, or some similar motive, induced him to attend on St. Paul's ministry, which it pleased God to bless for his conversion. After he had given very satisfactory proof of a real change, and manifested an excellent disposition by suitable behavior, which had greatly endeared him to the apostle; he judged it proper to send him back to his master; to whom he wrote this epistle, in order to procure Onesimus a more favorable reception, than he could otherwise have expected.—The most competent judges have given it a decided preference, as a model of good writing in the epistolary kind, to the most admired remains of antiquity. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive, how such a cause, as that of Onesimus, could have been pleaded in a more interesting, obliging, prudent, pathetic, and masterly manner. It is also very replete with useful instruction.—The apostle entertained no doubt of Philemon's compliance with his request; and expected that he would do more than he said. It is therefore probable, that Onesimus was not only received into favor, but set at liberty; and it is generally thought, that he became afterwards a minister of the gospel. Onesimus accompanied Tychicus to Colossè, and, it may be concluded, that the apostle wrote to Philemon at the same time; and that Onesimus, having delivered the letter to his master, and obtained his forgiveness, joined with Tychicus, in executing the apostle's commission to the Colossians.

The apostle salutes Philemon, 1-3; declares his joy at hearing of his faith and love, 4-7; earnestly and pathetically entreats him to receive into favor his fugitive servant, Onesimus, now become, by the apostle's ministry, a consistent believer, 8-21; desires him to provide for him a lodging, as he expected to be speedily released, 22; and concludes with salutations and benedictions, 23-25.

Note.—The apostle did not intend to write authoritatively to Philemon, and therefore he only styled himself “a prisoner of Jesus Christ:” (Notes, 8—11. Eph. 3:1—7. 4:1—6.) which tended to procure an affectionate regard to him; and he joined Timothy with him, that his request might be presented as the united desire of him and his brethren. Though Philemon is called “a fellow-laborer,” it is not certain that he was a minister; perhaps he served the cause of Christ by active diligence in another manner. (Note, Phil. 4:1—3.) The beloved Apphia is generally supposed to have been his wife, though some think that she was his sister. Archippus, whom the apostle called his “fellow-soldier,” and to whom he sent a special charge in another epistle, (Note, Col. 4:17.) is thought to have been the son or near relation of Philemon: and he seems to have resided in his family, which was so pious and well regulated, that it was in some respects a Christian church. time to time, by the good accounts which he received of Philemon's “love and faith,” even “his faith toward the Lord Jesus,” and his love to him and “to all the saints” for his sake. (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:6—9. Gal. 5:1—6. Eph. 1:15—23. Col. 1:3—8.) The obvious meaning of the passage requires a transposition of the words, which arise from an arrangement, not at all unsuitable to the Greek language, though it appears rather harsh in an English translation. The apostle also prayed, “that the communication of Philemon's faith might become effectual, &c.” Some explain this of his liberal communication from his temporal affluence, being made “effectual” for the relief of the saints, and for the evident demonstration of his faith, from which it sprang. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that his “communion,” or participation of faith in Christ, might be effectual in regulating his own temper and conduct. But, though both these senses may be contained in the words, they seem to have a still further meaning. The apostle probably prayed, that Philemon's endeavors, to “communicate” his faith in Christ to those around him, might be rendered effectual, through the evident excellency of his own example, and that of his family: so that men might be induced to acknowledge the reality and value of “every good thing which was in them,” by means of their relation to Christ; and thus to entertain a favorable opinion of that religion, which produced such beneficial effects, on the conduct of those who embraced it. (Notes, Matt. 5:14—16. 1 Pet. 2:12.) This he trusted would be the case; for he “had great joy” and comfort, in the accounts that he heard of his liberal love, by which the urgent necessities of Christians and ministers were supplied: so that, while their bodies were refreshed at his expense, their hearts were also rejoiced by his good example and pious conversation: and therefore the apostle cordially owned him, and greatly loved him, as his brother in the gospel. The word “brother,” placed thus at the end of a sentence, is peculiarly emphatical, and expressive of the most entire cordiality.

Note.—The apostle enters on the immediate design of the epistle. When he considered his own apostolical authority and Philemon's character; he supposed that he might, with propriety, have "enjoined" him, in the name of Christ, to do what was so evidently "convenient," or agreeable to the loving spirit of Christianity: yet he preferred the language of a supplicant, in the present case, and besought Philemon "for love's sake," even the love of Christ to them, and their love to him, and to each other through him, that he would grant him one special favor, which he had it much at heart to obtain. He would remind him, that his humble supplicant was "such a one as Paul the aged," (for he was probably above sixty years old at this time;) and "also a prisoner of Jesus Christ." For having, as a minister of the gospel, encountered numberless afflictions and perils, in seeking the salvation of men's souls, he was then enduring the hardships of a long imprisonment in the cause of Christ; and he could not doubt of Philemon's readiness to do any thing proper, which might mitigate the severity of his sufferings. His petition indeed was not presented for himself: but it was in behalf of "his son," even of one "whom he had begotten in his bonds," "the son of his old age," for whom he had the most tender parental affection; and this son was "Onesimus!" In the original Onesimus is mentioned at the close of the sentence; that the suspense and most affectionate introduction, might prepare Philemon to read a name, which could scarcely fail of being associated in his mind with unfavorable ideas. "Onesimus" signifies profitable, in allusion to which, the apostle allowed, that he had not formerly deserved that name, having been "unprofitable;" probably he had been unfaithful, dishonest, and unruly; perhaps addicted to other vices. This the apostle seems to have known from his own confession. But he spake of his faults in the gentlest language, and hastened to mention the change which had taken place; and by which his character was now made to answer the meaning of his name; so that he was become "profitable" both to Philemon and to the apostle. He was prepared to be a useful servant to the former; he had been serviceable to the latter, and he hoped that he would be still more so.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Onesimus was Philemon's legal property, and St. Paul had required and prevailed with Onesimus to return to him, having made sufficient trial of his sincerity; and he requested Philemon to receive him, with the same kindness, as he would the aged apostle's "own son according to the flesh;" being equally dear to him, as his spiritual child. He would gladly have kept him at Rome, to minister to him in his confinement; which Onesimus would willingly have done, in the bonds of the gospel, being attached to him from Christian love and gratitude: and, as he knew that Philemon would joyfully have done him any service in person, if he had been at Rome; so he would have considered Onesimus, as ministering to him in his master's stead. But he would not do any thing of this kind without his consent; lest he should seem to extort the benefit, and Philemon should appear to act from "necessity," rather than "from a willing mind." (Notes, 2 Cor. 9:1—7.) —He had indeed hopes of deriving benefit from Onesimus's faithful service, at some future period, by Philemon's free consent; yet he was not sure, that this was the Lord's purpose respecting him; for perhaps he permitted him to leave his master for a season, in so improper a manner, in order that, being converted, he might be received on his return with such affection, and might abide with Philemon with such faithfulness and diligence, that they should choose to live together, the rest of their lives, as fellow heirs of eternal felicity. (Marg. Ref. i.) In this case he knew that Philemon would no longer consider Onesimus merely as a slave, but view him as "above a slave, even as a brother beloved." This he was become to Paul in an especial manner, who had before been entirely a stranger to him: how much more then might it be supposed, that he would be endeared to Philemon, when he became well acquainted with his excellency; seeing he would be near to him, both in the flesh, as one of his domestics, and in the Lord, being one with him in Christ as a believer!

Note.—If Philemon deemed the apostle “a partner,” or partaker of the same grace, and dear to him for Christ’s sake; let him express his love to him by receiving Onesimus, with as much kindness as he would have received Paul himself if he had come in person: and, in case Onesimus had wronged Philemon, or was in his debt; let him place that to his account: and, as he wrote the epistle with his own hand, he gave, as it were, a promissory note, that he would repay it upon demand.—It is generally observed, that this is a plain instance of a debt, being imputed to one, which was contracted by another; and of one by a voluntary engagement becoming answerable for the misconduct of another; that the latter might be exempted from the punishment due to his crimes, and partake of benefits to which he had no right. This accords to the doctrine of Christ’s voluntary bearing the punishment of our sins, that we might receive the reward of his righteousness, by a reciprocal imputation.—Perhaps, the apostle understood that Philemon had expressed some sharpness concerning Onesimus’s conduct; or suspicion of his sincerity in his professed repentance; or knowing him to be naturally somewhat severe in his temper, he might fear lest he should punish him, as the laws permitted masters to do their slaves in such cases; which would not only have been grievous to Onesimus, hut disgraceful to the gospel, and to Philemon himself. He therefore so far interested himself in the matter: though he could scarcely suppose that payment would be demanded of him; and he added, that, in making this proposal, he had forborne to bring into the account, that Philemon “owed to him his ownself,” in an especial manner, as God had made him the instrument of his eternal salvation; thus intimating that he never could sufficiently requite that obligation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:14—17. Jam. 5:19,20.) He therefore pathetically besought him, to let him have an opportunity of “rejoicing on his account,” in the Lord’s kindness to him; and to grant him this request, which would as much refresh his compassionate heart, as Philemon’s liberality did “the bowels of the saints.” (Note, 4—7.) Having confidence that he was ready to obey the Lord’s will, which had been intimated by him, he had written to him, being assured that he would do even more than he had requested.—Our curiosity is not gratified by being informed of the effect of this epistle: yet we can hardly doubt, that Philemon forgave Onesimus, received him with kindness, remitted what he owed to him, and afterwards gave him his liberty, that he might attend on the apostle. His appointment with Tychicus to deliver the epistle to the Colossians seems to intimate, that Paul meant to employ him as a minister, which probably was afterwards done.

Note.—The apostle, though at this time in bonds, had an expectation of being speedily released, when he wrote this epistle, and he purposed to visit Philemon and the Colossians, when that took place. He was persuaded they did not forget to pray for his liberty, that he might be enabled to visit them, and he trusted, that in answer to their prayers, this would soon be effected; therefore he desired them to prepare him a convenient lodging.—This circumstance would add energy to his request in behalf of Onesimus.—Epaphras attended Paul so closely, that he might be deemed his fellow-prisoner; or perhaps he was imprisoned with him. #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The “fellow-laborers” and “fellow-soldiers” of Christ, ought to “pray and to thank God” for each other, with the greatest constancy and fervency: for faith in Christ, and love to him, should unite saints more closely, than any outward relation can the people of the world. (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:22—25.) Those who partake of this blessedness, must and will desire to communicate it to others; and their endeavors will be rendered effectual, through fervent prayer, and by a uniform course of piety, purity, integrity, and benevolence; which will constrain men to “acknowledge the good things, which are in them” as believers in Christ.—Faithful ministers have great joy and comfort in that little company of affluent Christians, whose “love abounds” in liberality to all men; and when “the bowels of the saints are refreshed by them,” and their wants generously supplied.—It is by no means proper to exercise authority on every occasion; even when ministers may be “bold to enjoin what is convenient.” It is frequently far more prudent, for love’s sake, to beseech even juniors and inferiors; especially when it may be supposed, that they will be reluctant to what is required, and when it may be difficult to convince them of its indispensable obligation. These requests, from such a one as in any good measure resembles "Paul the aged," will have the energy of injunctions, and engage compliance, without risking a subsequent distaste; which is always, in such cases, to be feared from the remaining self-love of the human heart; even in respect of the pious men, who would do much to alleviate the sufferings, or increase the comforts, of their faithful pastors. In such circumstances, wisdom and humility will teach the aged and experienced to become willingly the obliged parties, when they might assume a higher tone.—In speaking to persons about their sins, for their humiliation, the heinous nature and manifold aggravations of them should be insisted on: but in mentioning them to others, who are disposed to severity or resentment, we should soften and extenuate as far as truth will permit: and the subject ought to be introduced with all the tenderness and caution imaginable, that every thing may tend to conciliate, and nothing to exasperate.—When penitents show their sincerity by "works meet for repentance," they should be treated by ministers with parental tenderness; and taken under their patronage, in respect of the temporal consequences of their former sins. For in this manner, those "who were unprofitable" to their relatives and neighbors, and a trouble to all connected with them, are made "profitable" to the community and to the church of God. (Note, Mark 5:14—20. P. O. 14—20.) They often become greatly useful to ministers and their families, and a blessing to all among whom they reside; they supply other men's lack of service, to the suffering disciples of Christ, by tending on them in their stead; they promote the gospel by their example, conversation, and prayers; and some of them become preachers of the word of life to their fellow-sinners: for "behold all things are become new."—No prospect of usefulness should induce ministers to allow their converts to neglect relative obligations, or to fail of obedience to their superiors. One great evidence of true repentance consists in returning to the practice of those duties which had been neglected: and even liberty to engage in other services should be sought from those concerned; not as it were of necessity, but by their willing consent. We know not for what services God may intend those, whom he has marvellously converted; having therefore given our judgment, and used proper means, we should leave all things to his determination, in whose hand are the hearts of all the children of men.

V. 17—25.

Little do men know for what purposes the Lord leaves them to change their situations, or engage in enterprises, from worldly or criminal motives. We should have thought that Onesimus's departure from his master, would have been final, and his journey to Rome ruinous; yet the Lord had far other and more gracious purposes concerning him: (Note, Gen. 50:20.) and had he not over-ruled, in a similar manner, some of our ungodly projects, the writer and many readers may say, with humble gratitude, our destruction must have been the inevitable consequence; though, through that gracious interposition, they eventually proved the occasion of our being brought into the way of salvation and of usefulness. When we read of Onesimus's conversion at Rome, after having grown worse and worse, as it is probable, in Philemon's pious family; we should learn to despair of none, but still to use means, and offer prayers for them: and we should be ever ready to receive the penitent, with that kindness which God shows to his returning prodigals. (Note, Luke 15:20—24.) This should especially be attended to, in our conduct towards relations or domestics; whose conversion should be doubly welcome, notwithstanding their past misconduct, that they may be near to us, and beloved by us, "in the flesh, and in the Lord."—Ministers should, in such cases, love to be peace-makers; (Note, Matt. 5:9.) and they ought to give up their own interest, in order to prevail with offended parents or masters, to be reconciled to their penitent children or servants; that so the severity, animosity, and division may be prevented, by which the gospel is often disgraced. When such offenders have wronged others, or owe what they cannot pay, it may sometimes be proper for us to pay it for them, if we can; as followers of Christ who "bare our sins in his own body on the tree." Thus we shall best prevail with our brethren, to use lenity and forbearance: especially when we deal with those, who "owe their own selves" to the blessing of God on our ministry: and such persons ought to be reminded to let their loving pastors "have joy of them in the Lord," to refresh their hearts, to answer their confidence, and even to do more than modesty will permit them to request. Then their prayers for each other will be more fervent; and, in answer to them, their meetings on earth will be comfortable and cordial: but even if this be denied, "the grace of the Lord Jesus will be with their spirits," and they will soon meet before the throne, to join for ever in admiring the riches of redeeming love.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

HEBREWS.

THE general testimony of antiquity, the current tradition of the church, and the judgment of the most competent modern critics, determine this epistle to have been written by the apostle Paul; though some, both in former and latter times, have thought otherwise. “‘The epistle of Paul.’” Thus we find it written in all our manuscripts, one only excepted, in which it is ‘only, “The epistle to the Hebrews.”’ Beza.—‘It is evident, that this epistle was generally received in ancient times, by those Christians who used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman empire. In particular, Clement of Alexandria, before the end of the second century, received this epistle as St. Paul’s, and quoted it frequently, and without any doubt or hesitation.—It is not expressly quoted as St. Paul’s, by any of the Latin writers in the three first centuries. However, it was known to Irenæus and Tertullian.—It is manifest, that it was received as an epistle of St. Paul, by many Latin writers in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries.’ Lardner.—Origen, who held some peculiar notions concerning it, says, ‘The ancients did not rashly hand it down as St. Paul’s.’—‘It is very certain, that the churches and writers, who were ancients with respect to Origen, must have conversed with the apostles themselves, or at least with their successors.—Since this tradition was ancient, in the times of Clement of Alexandria and Origen, about a hundred and thirty years after the epistle was written; it must have had its rise in the days of Paul himself, and so cannot reasonably be contested.’ Hallet in Macknight.—The doubts, which have been entertained on this subject, seem principally to have arisen from the circumstance, of the apostle’s name not being affixed to it, according to his custom in all his other epistles.—‘If it is not to be considered as Paul’s, because it does not bear his name; let it belong to no one, because it bears no name. But, on the contrary, I contend, from this very circumstance, that it belongs to Paul rather than to any other person. For why should any other person have omitted his name? But Paul had a sufficient reason, for sending an anonymous letter to Jerusalem: not, as I think, because he was the peculiar apostle of the Gentiles, as Peter of the circumcision; but because he knew his name was greatly hated at Jerusalem by the enemies of Christianity, and that their fury was even then raging; and was perhaps exasperated by occasion of his imprisonment: (10:33,34.) he was therefore unwilling to inflame them against the church by affixing his name.’ Beza.—‘As Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, in writing to the Hebrews, he did not assume his apostolical character; because it was little respected by the unbelieving Jews and Judaizing Christians.—It being designed, not for the believing Jews alone, but for the unbelieving part of the nation; especially the learned doctors and scribes at Jerusalem, Paul might think it prudent, not only to avoid assuming his apostolical character, but even to conceal his name, ... which ... would have prejudiced the unbelieving part of the nation to such a degree, that, in all probability, they would not have read his letter.’ Macknight.—The apostle intended to prove the doctrines of Christianity, and the changes, which it had introduced, and would introduce, to be entirely consistent with “the oracles of God,” as received by the Jews; and either clearly predicted, or evidently typified, or at least sufficiently intimated, by them; so that any man, who fully understood the Old Testament, must have expected the substance of what was taught by Christ and his apostles, and the events which had occurred. It is, therefore, highly probable, that he expressly aimed to write an epistle, which might be put into the hands either of Judaizing Christians, or unbelieving Jews, and read by them, without any prejudice, on account of the person who wrote it: let them impartially consider his arguments. (Preface to Esther.) It is however evident, that he supposed some of the Hebrews would know from whom it came. (10:34. 13:18,23,24.) But these intimations are not given till the argumentative part of the epistle is ended; and they would not be clearly understood by any but the apostle’s friends.—The writer’s connexion with Timothy, and his residence in Italy, tend to confirm the ancient tradition: and the other objections, as the supposition that the style is more elegant than St. Paul’s; and that he uses expressions, which imply that he received his doctrine from those who heard Christ, and not by immediate revelation, &c. appear very vague and frivolous. He might, perhaps, bestow more pains in this epistle, concerning the style, than he did when he wrote to other churches: but, in fact, many competent judges are of opinion, that it is not more elegant. Certainly the internal evidence, arising from the writer’s manner of expressing himself, and his reasoning, and things of a similar nature, corroborate the opinion, that St. Paul was the author: and if he thought it prudent to write as a converted Jew to his countrymen, and not as an apostle, who insisted on his authority; he must of course join himself with the other Jewish converts, and not distinguish himself from them, as having received his doctrine immediately from Christ. (Comp. 2:4. with 1 Pet. 4:3.)

Origen and some others were of opinion, that the epistle was written in the Hebrew or Syriac language; and translated into Greek by Clement, or Luke; but if this had been the case, it can hardly be supposed, that no one copy of the Hebrew epistle should be mentioned as extant in their days, and as seen by them.—The quotations from the Old Testament are generally taken from the Septuagint, even where that version in some degree varies from the Hebrew: but this would scarcely have taken place, had the epistle been written in Hebrew.—The Hebrew names are interpreted also in Greek, in a manner, that is not at all like the addition of a translator. The apostle, doubtless supposed that the epistle would circulate widely among his countrymen, who spoke Greek; and among Christians in general, as well as among the Hebrews; and therefore, probably, he wrote in Greek, as more generally in use at that time, than any other language in the world: and as it seems to have been written principally for the more learned of the Hebrews, and the teachers in the first instance; the circumstance, that the unlearned in Judea could not read it, would not counterbalance the advantages of its being legible by such numbers in every other place. For even in Judea the teachers would make it known to the common people: and the time was at hand when both Jews and Christians would be removed from the settlements in that country.—The Hebrews were the Jews in Judea, and those who spoke a dialect of the Hebrew: and to such of them, as professed Christianity, the epistle was addressed; and probably sent to Jerusalem, to the rulers and pastors of the church in that city: yet, the writer evidently expected, that the unconverted Jews also would read it; and their conviction and instruction seem to have been a leading part of his object in writing it.—It opens with a declaration of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ, and proofs from the old Testament that the Messiah was to be far greater than the angels. It then shows his superiority to Moses and other eminent men of the nation; proves, by the most unanswerable arguments, that in him the types of the law had their full accomplishment; that he was the substance of all those shadows; and that the ancient scriptures taught Israel to expect an entirely new dispensation, priesthood, and covenant, under the reign of the Messiah. These reasonings are interspersed and closed with most solemn and affectionate warnings and exhortations, addressed to different descriptions of persons. At length the writer shows the nature, efficacy, and triumphs of faith; by which all the saints in former ages had been accepted by God, and enabled to obey, suffer, and do exploits in defence of their holy religion: after which he adds various instructions, admonitions, encouragements, and exhortations; and then concludes with the customary salutations and benedictions.—The internal excellency of this epistle, as connecting the Old Testament and the New in the most convincing and instructive manner, and elucidating both more fully than any other epistle, or perhaps than all of them, added to other arguments, puts the divine inspiration of it beyond doubt: we here find the great doctrines, which we have elsewhere been considering, stated, proved, and applied to practical purposes, with peculiar animation, energy, and persuasion. It is supposed to have been written at the close of the apostle's first imprisonment at Rome, when he either was set at liberty, or daily expected it.

CHAP. I.

The writer declares the essential Deity and mediatorial glory of the Son of God, by whom the Father speaks to men under the gospel dispensation, 1—4. He adduces several scriptures to prove, that the Messiah was to be far greater than the angels, and worshipped by them as their Creator and Lord, 5—14.

Note.—The Hebrews allowed the divine authority of the Old Testament; and therefore the writer of this epistle waved the mention of his apostolical authority, and reasoned with them principally from their own scriptures: and he thought it best to conceal his name; that none might be deterred by it from reading his arguments, or induced to receive them with prejudice. He therefore entered upon his subject without any introduction.—God, “the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Israel,” who in former ages had spoken to the progenitors of the Hebrews, from the calling of Abraham, to the latter times of their nation, “by the prophets,” mere men of the same fallen nature with their brethren; who had gradually made known his truth and will, from time to time, through successive generations; and who had spoken to “the prophets,” in divers methods, by personal conference, by dreams and visions, or by supernatural impulses upon their minds; had, “in the last days,” under the dispensation of the gospel, “spoken to them by his Son,” appearing personally among them in human nature.—The eternal Word, or Son, of God had indeed appeared, and spoken to the patriarchs, prophets, and others: but he then spoke as JEHOVAH, as God, to a few individuals, by whom his will was made known to their brethren: (Note, Phil. 2:5—8.) whereas he had at length “become flesh, and dwelt among” men, and among the Jews almost exclusively, to fulfil ancient prophecies and promises, and to give the most complete and explicit revelation of God, and of his truth and will, to mankind; as well as to procure salvation for them. (Notes, John 1:14—18. Rom. 15:8—13.) So that, while Moses and other mere men were the prophets of the old dispensation; “the only begotten Son of God,” appearing in human nature, was the great prophet of the new dispensation. (Note, 3:1—6.)—This glorious Person the Father had appointed “Heir of all things.” As the co-equal Son of God, the government of all worlds by original right was vested in him: possessing the essential perfections of the Deity, he was capable of exercising universal authority, which no mere creature could have done; and he had been appointed by the Father, in respect of his assumed manhood, to rule over all worlds on the mediatorial throne, with uncontrolled dominion and unrivalled glory. Thus he inherited all things; and no creature could have any inheritance of power, honor, or felicity, except as derived from him, and held in subordination to him. (Notes, 2:5—9. Ps. 2:7—12. Is. 9:6,7. Matt. 28:18. John 5:20—24. Rom. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Eph. 1:15—23. Phil. 2:9—11.) This appointment had the more evident propriety, in that “by him also God made the worlds;” being One with the Father and the eternal Spirit, in essence, power, and counsel, he had been the immediate Creator of the heavens and the earth, and of every order of beings in the universe. (Notes, Prov. 8:22—30. John 1:1—3. 1 Cor. 8:4—6. Col. 1:15—17.) The idea of a created agent, by whom God made all things, which some have endeavored to support from this text, is so absurd in itself, as well as contrary to other scriptures, that it is astonishing it could ever have been adopted. (Notes, Is. 44:24. 45:12,13.) The apostle evidently meant, that God now spake to men, by that same glorious Person, who had been the immediate Creator of the world, and who was also exalted to the mediatorial throne, as “Heir of all things.” ‘I believe, it is as impossible to understand, how a man should have this empire over all things in heaven and earth, and over death itself, and yet be a mere man; as it is to understand any mystery of the sacred Trinity.’ Whitby.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The essence of the Deity is and must be invisible to man: (Notes, John 1:18. 1 Tim. 6:13—16.) but “the only begotten Son,” of whom the writer spoke, had been appointed to make known his glory and perfections: being “one with the Father,” and equal to him in the divine nature; and being also distinct from him, as to his personal subsistence. By assuming human nature he became “the brightness of the divine glory;” or the shining forth of the glory of God to mankind; and he so made known the perfections of the Godhead to them; that “he who saw the Son saw the Father also.” (Notes, John 5:17—19. 10:26—31,32—39. 12:44—50. 14:7—14. 17:20,21.) For the Son was “the express Image,” or the character of the Father’s Person, or subsistence; and showed every part of the nature and perfections of God to man, with the greatest exactness and in the most effectual manner possible; so that in proportion as any man knows Christ, in his Person, character, and salvation, he knows the Father also; and he that knows not Christ, has no real knowledge of God. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. Luke 10:21,22. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. Col. 1:15—17. 1 John 2:20—25.) Not only did the Father create the world by the Son, but the same divine Agent still “upholds all things by the word of his power;” as one in the unity of the Godhead with the Father; and he even upheld all things in being, and in their settled order, by his almighty word and will, when he appeared on earth as the visible “Effulgence of the Father’s glory, and the Character of his subsistence;” of which he gave many proofs in his miraculous power over the course of nature, over legions of evil spirits, over diseases, and death. Yet this same Person, who created the world, and “upholds all things by the word of his power;” having become the High Priest of his people, by himself purged away their guilt with the sacrifice of his death upon the cross. Then, having risen as a mighty Conqueror over death and hell, he ascended in human nature, to be seated as “Heir of all things” upon the mediatorial throne, at the “right hand of the Father,” where he displays his glorious majesty. There the incarnate Son is enthroned in pre-eminent dignity, as “the Head over all things to his church;” “which he purchased with his own blood.” (Notes, 1,2. Acts 20:28. Col. 1:18—20.) For he was made so much “better than the angels, or superior in authority to them; that they were all rendered subject to him, as reigning in human nature; seeing he “inherited,” as “the only begotten Son of God,” “a more excellent name,” or nature, than they: for, however exalted any of them were, in capacity or authority, they were only mere creatures, and he their infinite Creator. (*Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. Eph. 1:15—23. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 1 Pct. 3:21,22. glory," and "the character of his subsistence," are illustrations, taken from external objects, of the eternal generation of Christ, and his equality with the Father in the Godhead. But though the author is decidedly of opinion, that Christ is called the only Son of God, in respect of his divine nature; and therefore allows the eternal generation, as well as the equality of the Son with the Father: yet he does not think that the scripture contains any illustrations of these mysteries; or that we are taught to form any ideas of the manner, in which they subsist; but rather to receive them in implicit faith, as the revelation of God, and to adore them as absolutely incomprehensible by us in our present state. He, therefore, supposes these expressions to signify the manifestation of the glory, character, and perfection of "the invisible God" to man, in and by the Person of his incarnate Son; whose original equality with the Father in his divine nature; and his voluntary assumption of the human nature, concurred in rendering him the proper medium, so to speak, through which we might see the "effulgency," or shining forth of the divine glory; and become acquainted with the perfections and subsistence of God, in the best manner, of which in our present condition we are capable. He is also confirmed in this view of the passage, by finding, that the venerable reformer Beza, interprets it in the same manner, and makes the same objections to the other interpretations: except, that he translates the word ὑποστασις, persona, "person" I think, improperly, for the subsistence of the Deity, not the personal distinction of the Father and the Son, seems to be intended.

Note.—In the preceding verses, the apostle had stated the outlines of that doctrine, on which he meant more largely to discourse: and, having declared the personal and mediatorial superiority and high pre-eminence of "the Son of God" above angels; he proceeded to show, that the Old Testament prophecies spake of the promised Messiah in similar language. As we are satisfied by abundant evidence, that the writers of the New Testament were equally inspired, with those of the Old; their expositions are to us of equal authority with the original passages, which they adduce. But when the apostle reasoned with the Hebrews out of their scriptures; he doubtless quoted them in that sense, in which most of them had been used to understand them, or in which it might be proved they ought to be understood. Had not the more learned Jews, at the time when the epistle was written, been accustomed to understand the texts here brought forward, in the sense which the apostle affixes to them; he would scarcely have adduced them, as proofs of his doctrine, without hesitation, in an argumentative treatise, which he knew must pass the ordeal of the strictest examination, by the most prejudiced and hostile persons. Now, if they were sufficient proofs to the persons immediately addressed, they must be sufficient for all, who consider the writer as fully knowing, by divine inspiration, both the doctrine of Christ, and the true meaning of the scriptures: though the context might otherwise, in some instances, have led us to suppose them instructive accommodations; and though the Jews, in subsequent ages, to evade the writer's conclusion, have (as it might previously have been expected) attempted to put another construction on them.—We have before briefly considered the scriptures quoted; yet it is necessary here again to examine them. The first is brought from an evident prophecy of the Messiah's kingdom. JEHOVAH had in it addressed the Messiah, in such language, as had never been used to any angel. The words quoted were spoken above a thousand years before the birth of Jesus, and were the declaration of a preceding decree: they must therefore relate to his Sonship, or eternal generation; for the subsequent production of his human nature, by the power of the Holy Spirit, would not give him that essential and original superiority to the angels, which the argument here evidently required. Nor could his appointment to the office of Messiah be meant by the words, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee:" as that appointment was the consequence, rather than the cause, of his superiority to the angels; he was advanced above them, "as he had inherited a more excellent name than they:" and his Sonship is plainly denoted to be a participation of the Father's nature; and not merely a communication of existence by an act of creating power, or adoption by an act of special grace. (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12. Acts 13:24—37.)—The next quotation appears primarily to have been meant of Solomon; (Note, 2 Sam. 7:12—16.) but Solomon was a most remarkable type of the Messiah, as the Jews in general must know: so that when JEHOVAH said of him in so peculiar and distinguishing a sense, "I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son;" it must be obvious that this, in its fullest meaning, was to be understood of the Antitype rather than of the type.—The next proof was brought from a prophecy of the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom, in which it is said, "Worship him all ye gods." (Note, Ps. 97:3—7.) JEHOVAH there spoke of "bringing in" the Messiah; whom he had elsewhere declared to be his "First-begotten Son;" and appointed to be "Heir of all things;" and at the same time he called upon the most exalted of his creatures to "submit to the Son," to adore and "honor him, even as they honored the Father that sent him." (Note, Rev. 5:11—14.) For, though the magistrates and grandees of the earth might be included, yet all the angels of God were evidently intended also. But JEHOVAH had never spoken in such language concerning angels; of whom it had been said, that he made them "spirits," or winds, (for so it may be rendered,) and as "flames of fire" to be his ministering servants. (Notes, 2 Kings 2:11. 6:15—17. Ps. 104:4. Is. 6:1—4.)—He had indeed formed them active, powerful, pure, and spiritual intelligences, to perform his mandates, with inexpressible force and fervent love: but he had never commanded other rational creatures to worship them; nay, he had most peremptorily forbidden the worship of any creature: yet he required the most exalted of them to worship his Son, even when brought into this world to dwell in human nature! A most decided proof of an infinite disparity between Christ and the highest angels. (Note, Rev. 19:9,10.)—"When he introduceth the First born into the world, he saith, "Let all God's messengers worship him." Whereas, concerning messengers he saith, "Who maketh winds his messengers, and flaming fire his ministers." Campbell.—This construction indeed accords to the scope of the passage in the Psalms, as describing the different parts of the creation executing the Creator's mandates: yet the apostle's quotation requires us to explain the passage of the ministration of angels. The learned writer supposes the apostle's argument to rest, in part, on the difference between messenger, (αγγελος,) and Son: the former term being used even of inanimate beings; the latter appropriate to the divine Saviour.—The first and second quotations are exactly from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew. (2 Sam. 7:14. Ps. 2:7.) The third is nearly from the Septuagint, only changing the second person into the third; and putting "the angels of God" instead of "his angels;" and it varies from the Hebrew. (Ps. 97:7.)—The very words of the apostle occur in the Septuagint, (Deut. 32:41.) but there is nothing answering to them in the Hebrew. The last quotation is nearly from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew. (Ps. 104:4.)

Note.—A passage is next adduced from a most remarkable prophecy, in which JEHOVAH said to the Messiah, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever:" he addressed him as "God," declaring the perpetuity of his mediatorial kingdom to the end of the world, and over his redeemed people to all eternity. (Notes, Ps. 45:6,7. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) "The sceptre," with which he would rule his people, and the universe, for their benefit, was "a sceptre of righteousness;" even the exercise of his pardoning mercy would be most honorable to divine justice, and most effectual to promote righteousness in the world. (Note, 7:1—3.) His laws and administration would be altogether righteous; whilst he acted as the Friend and Saviour of sinners, he would most perfectly "love righteousness and hate iniquity." As "the Son of God" he was essentially and unchangeably holy; his human nature would be produced and preserved entirely free from all sin; his whole conduct, even unto death, would be perfectly righteous, and the government of his kingdom would be the same for ever. On this account "God, even his God" and Father, would anoint him, (for the future was spoken of, as if it had already taken place,) "with the oil of gladness," or the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, (the Source of all substantial gladness in the heart of man,) in a more abundant manner, than any of those prophets or servants of God had received, whom he owned as his "fellows," companions, or brethren in the human nature. The Holy "Spirit was given without measure" to Christ, for the benefit of his church, in consequence of his undertaking, incarnation, obedience to death, and exaltation to the mediatorial throne: from this "fulness all" his brethren "have received" their appointed measure; by which they have been qualified for their services, comforted under their trials, and prepared for their future happiness in heaven. (Notes, Is. 11:2—5. 42:1—4. 59:20,21. 61:1—3. John 1:16. 3:27—36. 4:10—15. 7:25—36. Rev. 22:1.)—Some suppose, that angels were meant by Christ's fellows, because the apostle was proving his superiority to angels: but he never bore "the nature of angels;" and partaking of the same nature seems to be the meaning of the expression. (Note, 2:16—18.) The quotation was full to the apostle's purpose, by proving that JEHOVAH spake of the Messiah, in such language, as he never used concerning angels. and the Psalmist, from whom he adduced his proof, spoke of the Messiah as incarnate, of his espousing the church to himself, and of believers as the companions of the glorious King. They were indeed "anointed with the oil of gladness" for his sake; but he far more than they all, even as his excellency and dignity exceeded theirs. (Notes, Ps. 45:)—‘They, who imagine this Psalm is an epithalamium, upon Solomon’s marrying Pharaoh’s daughter, must suppose, that it is foretold, ... that Solomon was to have a numerous progeny by her, whom he would set up for princes and rulers, up and down the world (16). But this cannot be true: for beside that we read not of any children Solomon had by Pharaoh’s daughter, ... Rehoboam, who succeeded him, was the son of Naamah, an Ammonitess. And so far was he from being able to set up his sons to rule over other countries, that it was with great difficulty, his successors kept two tribes of the twelve steadfast to them.—Certainly, “a greater than Solomon was here.”’ Bp. Pierce.—Very many other suppositions, by which the prophecies, concerning Christ, are explained away, or enervated, by men called Christians, might be shown to be equally absurd.—The quotation is nearly from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew.

12 And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: <sup>q</sup> but thou art the same, <sup>r</sup> and thy years shall not fail.

Note.—(Note, Ps. 102:25—28.) The Psalm, whence these verses are quoted, seems to be a prayer of the afflicted church of Israel, for the coming of her expected Deliverer: yet we might not have discovered, that the Son “of God” was personally addressed, had not the apostle led our attention to it in this view. But, considering it in connexion with other scriptures, and remembering that the ancient prophets continually spoke of their expected Messiah; as their great Deliverer from all enemies and troubles, we shall perceive a propriety in the church, under affliction, addressing herself to him, as her unchangeable Friend. He had “in the beginning created the heavens and the earth;” these would at length “wax old and wear out as a garment,” but he would still remain possessed of infinite power and perfection. At the appointed period, therefore, he would “lay them aside,” with as much ease as a man “folds up a garment,” or changes it for another; and so introduce “new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness:” and still He would continue “the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.” (Notes, 13:7,8.)

Matt. 24:32—35, v. 35. 2 Pet. 3:5—7,10—13. Rev. 1:8. 20:11—15. 21:1—8.)—Probably, the Hebrews in general were prepared to understand this psalm, as well as the others, of the Messiah: it is, however, to us a most explicit testimony to the Deity of Christ, as One with the Father, the Creator of all things.

Thou, Lord, &c. (10) The quotation is taken from the Septuagint, which exactly accords to the Hebrew; except that the word, rendered in our version, “change,” is translated by ἐλιξεις, folded up; but the Alexandrian copy of the Septuagint, and some copies of the New Testament, read ἀλλαξεις, change.

Note.—Ἰερωαν had never spoken to any angel in such language, as was contained in another acknowledged prophecy of the Messiah; in which he called him to sit, as a mighty Prince, on his right hand, till he had crushed and put under his feet all those, who presumed to rebel against his authority. (Notes, Ps. 110:1. Matt. 22:41—46. Acts 2:33—36. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) Did not the Hebrews well know, that “all angels,” even the most exalted of them, were so far from possessing such supreme and universal authority, that they all were attendant spirits, and servants of the Lord, to execute his commands with unreserved submission. (Notes, Ps. 103:20—22. Is. 6:1—4. Rev. 5:11—14.) and that they were sent forth by him, to “minister” to those of the human race, who were appointed to be “the heirs of salvation?” (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Note, Luke 16:22,23. P. O. 19—26.) Their willing and delightful obedience to these commands, and their loving services to inferior and sinful creatures, for the Lord’s sake, showed a most excellent disposition, and was worthy of imitation; yet no homage or worship were due to them on that account: on the contrary, they were joint worshippers of Ἰερωαν, whom they adored, in the person of Christ, the incarnate Son of God, and the Saviour of sinful men. As therefore such things were spoken of the Messiah, immensely beyond all which had been said of angels, in the sacred scriptures; it was unreasonable to expect a mere man, or a temporal kingdom; or to suppose this glorious Lord would come to confirm and continue that dispensation, which had been given “by the ministration of angels.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We can never ſufficiently bleſs our God, that he has, in ſo many ways, and with ſuch increaſing clearneſs, ſpoken concerning ſalvation, to us wretched ſinners; and eſpecially that he has ſent the meſſage of mercy to us, by his “well-beloved Son,” whoſe dignity gives peculiar authority to every appointment, and certainty to every truth and promiſe. That “the Firſt-begotten” of the Father, “the Heir of all things,” by whom all worlds were created, and “by the word of whoſe power all things are upheld;” who is “the Effulgency of the divine glory;” and “the manifeſtation of the divine perfections;” ſhould “by himſelf purge our ſins,” is a myſtery of love, which exceeds and overwhelms all our admiration, praiſe, and gratitude. Now, “having ſat down at the right hand of the Majeſty on high;” “angels, principalities, and powers, are ſubject to him,” who “inheriteth a far more excellent name than they.” Let us not then perverſely and ungratefully reſuſe him our adorations, whiſt “all the angels of God worſhip him.” For our ſalvation he abaſed himſelf, that he might “redeem us to God with his blood;” and ſhall we, on that account, reſuſe to adore and “honor him, even as we honor the Father that ſent him?”

V. 5—14.

We ſhould never forget, that all the enemies of Chriſt will at length be put under his feet; and that all, “who will not have him to reign over them,” are his enemies. (Note, Luke 19: 11—27, v. 27.) Let us then ſeek mercy of our God, in that way which glorifies his juſtice alſo: let us bow to the ſceptre of our Redeemer’s grace; put our ſouls under his protection; and ſeek that renewal of our hearts, which will make us delight in obeying his holy commands, and render us like him in “loving righteouſneſs and hating iniquity.” In proportion as we are anointed with “the oil of gladneſs” from his fulneſs, and as members of his myſtical body, this will be our character: and “if any man have not the Spirit of Chriſt, he is none of his.” We cannot indeed ſervē him as angels do, “who excel in ſtrength;” and are like a vehement wind, or the ſwift lightning, in executing his mandates: but we may copy their love, their alacrity and humility, in miniſtering at his word, to the pooreſt of “the heirs of ſalvation,” who are by this miniſtry of angels more royally attended than the mightieſt of ungodly men. Surely then we ſhould deem none of our brethren, nor any of their concerns, beneath us; but, like theſe pure ſpirits, ſhould count it our honor to do them good for Chriſt’s ſake. (Note, John 13:12—17. P. O. 8—17.) Such humiliation and ſelf-abatement will make way for our exaltation to be “equal with the angels,” yea, to “ſit down with Chriſt upon his throne:” when he, who at firſt created the world, ſhall, with unchangeable power, deſtroy it as a worn out garment, and “make all things new:” and when all they, whoſe hearts and hopes were placed on its perishing treaſures and fading glories, will be driven from his preſence into everlaſting miſery.

Note.—The apoſtle in the miſt of his argument, paused, as it were, after the proof of Chriſt’s pre-eminent dignity, to make ſome application of his doctrine. The Hebrews, and all to whom the goſpel came, “ought to give the more earneſt,” believing, and obedient attention to what they had heard; becauſe of the majeſty of the Speaker, and the gracious nature of his words. (Note, Matt. 17:5—8. Acts 3:22—33.) It was incumbent on thoſe alſo, who profeſſed Chriſtianiſy, to apply their minds with increaſing reverence to theſe important ſubjects; leſt at any time, through temptation, worldly cares and pleaſures, or perſecution, they ſhould be induced to “let them ſlip,” or run out as water from a leaky veſſel. This aptly represents the treachery of the memory, reſpecting ſpiritual things; and the way in which good inſtructions, convictions, or affections gradually vaniſh, and no abiding change is made or effect produced by them.—The Jews counted the authority of the law to be great, and their perpetuity indubitable, becauſe it was spoken by angels, as employed by JEHOVAH in delivering it to their fathers from mount Sinai. (Notes, Ex. 19:16—20. Deut. 33:2. Acts 7:51—53. Gal. 3:19—22.) But “if the word spoken by ministering spirits was steadfast,” so that JEHOVAH would not permit any of the people to transgress in any way, without indicting on them merited punishment; (Marg. Ref. e;) how “could they escape” his vengeance, if they neglected “so great salvation” as that of the gospel? The greatness of the Saviour, who “created and upholds all things;” the immensity of the price paid by him for man’s salvation; the depth of the misery from which he saves his people, and their perishing need of this salvation, its entire freeness to the chief of sinners who seek for it, without limitation or exception; the infinite provision made for the supply of all their wants; and the glorious felicity in which it terminates: all these things, and far more, unite in rendering it worthy to be called “so great salvation,” even so great a salvation that it surpasses all conception. To refuse this invaluable blessing, from pride, love of the world and sin, or attachment to superstitious vanities; to neglect it, through sloth, procrastination, an aversion to the means of grace, or a fear of persecution; and to oppose or corrupt it, from enmity to God and holiness, not only leave men under “the curse of the law,” but incur the condemnation of treating the truth of God as a lie, of despising his mercy, defying his justice and power, and rejecting his most gracious and urgent overtures to reconciliation. (Notes, John 3:19—21. 1 John 5:9,10.) How then can such persons escape the wrath to come?—This salvation first began to be published, in the fullest display of it under the gospel dispensation, by the Lord himself, appearing in human nature, as the great Prophet of the church. He deigned to be the Preacher of this great salvation: and after his ascension into heaven “to appear in the presence of God for us,” it was confirmed to the Jews and others, by his apostles and evangelists, who had been eye-witnesses of his glory, had heard his doctrine, and received their commission immediately from him. Moreover, God himself bore witness to their doctrine, as that of his beloved Son, by various miraculous powers exercised by them, and conferred on others also; and by the gifts of his Holy Spirit, dispensed to them according to his own sovereign will. (Notes, Mark 16:17—20. John 15:26,27. 20:24—29.) so that the condescension of “the Son of God,” in becoming incarnate, and in first publishing his doctrine by his own personal ministry; his exaltation, and the subsequent sending of his ambassadors, with such divinely attested credentials, to preach salvation to sinners, concurred in calling the attention of the Jews from the abrogated Mosaic dispensation to Christianity.

5 For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection<sup>n</sup> the world to come, whereof we speak.

8 Thou <sup>t</sup> hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. <sup>u</sup> But now we see not yet all things put under him.

Note.—The argument concerning the Messiah’s superiority to the angels, is here resumed. “The world to come,” is supposed to have been a phrase in use among the Jews, denoting the times of the Messiah. This period began at the first coming of Christ, and will continue till his second coming. The words, however, do not occur elsewhere: and some think, that the apostle alludes to the words of the prophet, concerning “new heavens and a new earth.” (Note, Is. 65:17—19.) This includes the dispensation of the Messiah and the millennium, as connected with heavenly happiness. These are not subjected to angels, but to him whom all the angels worship and obey; nor were they ministerially employed in the introduction of it, as they had been in the giving of the law, and in many things relating to Israel’s settlement in Canaan; but the Captain of Salvation exclusively and openly. (Note, 10—13.)—This had been implied in what was “spoken by one in a certain place,” with which the Hebrews were well acquainted. In a view of the starry heavens, those majestic displays of God’s creating power, David had exclaimed, “What is man,” &c. (Note, Ps. 8:4—9.)—The words might indeed be explained of the attention and kindness of God to so inconsiderable a creature as man, amidst the immensity of his works. He had made him at first in some degree inferior to the angels, but he “had crowned him with glory and honor,” and made him lord of this lower creation. Yet, as man had soon fallen from his original dignity, had lost his crown of honor, and retained but an imperfect dominion over the creatures; (Note, Gen. 1:26,27. 3:) and as the Messiah was intended to be the chief Glory and blessing of the fallen race: the Psalmist might properly be considered, as "in Spirit" speaking of him; and of JEHOVAH'S being mindful of the human race, and visiting them, by giving his own Son to become the Son of man for their salvation. Indeed, if the words were exactly weighed, it would be found, that they had not received a full accomplishment in any other sense: for if God "put all things in subjection under the feet" of the Son of man, it must follow that there was nothing left "which was not put in subjection under him;" whereas it was manifest, that all things, even here on earth, (not to speak of other worlds,) were not thus put in subjection to man; for many of the creatures scorned to bear his yoke, and some even made war against him. But believers, "looking to Jesus," saw the accomplishment in his exaltation, and in the glorious and blessed event of it: he had become "a little lower than the angels," by appearing "in the likeness of sinful flesh," that he might be capable of suffering death; but speedily he had been, as the Son of man, "crowned with glory and honor," placed on the mediatorial throne, invested with universal dominion, and "made Head over all things to his church." So that, in fact, "all things in heaven and earth, and under the earth," were put in subjection to him; and, though some for a time refused to submit to him, they must all at length, either be his willing servants, or be crushed under his feet as enemies, (Notes, 1:13,14. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) Thus, by means of his humiliation, he became capable of dying; and, by his subsequent exaltation, he was enabled to apply the benefits of his death to his people; and so "he tasted death" for the benefit of every man, who should come to trust in his salvation. This constitution was the effect of the plenteous mercy and free favor of God to our rebellious race, as the Psalmist had intimated: nor could that grace ever be sufficiently admired.—A little lower. (9) Many expositors suppose the original to mean, "lower for a short time;" that is, during the term of our Lord's humiliation on earth: but the use of the same word in the seventh verse, determines its sense here; and there it can have no reference to time, unless we explain the Psalm as a prophecy of Christ exclusively, without allowing that either Adam or his posterity were at all intended. It is indeed argued, that Jesus was made, in human nature, immensely lower than the angels, being "despised and rejected of men," and considered as one of the most abject of the human race. This objection, however, seems to be of no validity; for his real dignity and excellency as man, and not the opinion of others concerning him, are meant. He was, in human nature, as the "first Adam" had been, "a little lower than the angels:" and, being made like us in all things, sin alone excepted, he became capable of suffering and death, from which angels are exempted. In these respects he was "made a little lower than the angels:" but in all other things, he, even as Man in his lowest humiliation, was little lower than they, being immensely superior to all others of the human race, not excepting Adam himself before the fall.—Taste death.] Some explain these words as signifying the pain, which our Lord endured in dying; and others, as marking the short time during which he continued dead: but the expression seems to have been in use among the Jews, as merely denoting to die. (Marg. Ref. a.)—The quotation is from the Septuagint: but that entirely corresponds with the Hebrew; except as it translates Elohim, (often rendered Gods;) by the word "angels;" as it does in many other places: and the word God, is substituted in the translation of the last quotation, for JEHOVAH in the Hebrew.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Whatever the Jews might object to the sufferings and crucifixion of him, who was preached to them as the Messiah; yet it certainly "became" the eternal God, for whose glory, and by whose power, all things were created, and are upheld and governed, to adopt this method. It had not only pleased him as a Sovereign to do this: but it was admirably suited to manifest the glory of all his perfections; yea, it was necessary for the harmonious display of them. Having therefore purposed to predestinate to the adoption of children an innumerable company of Adam's fallen race; (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) he was pleased, in his infinite wisdom and love, to appoint them "a Captain," who should call them forth out of their state of sin and misery, and lead them, through life and death, to his eternal glory: for the word, rendered "in bringing," agrees with that translated "Captain." It was proper, that this Captain, Prince, or Commander, who leads an innumerable multitude of fallen sinners, as the "children of God," to victory over Satan, sin, the world, and death, and to eternal "glory,"—that this Author of their salvation, should be "made perfect through sufferings;" that is, perfectly authorized, as well as qualified, for every part of that most important work. (Note, 5:7—10.) For, by assuming human nature, and "humbling himself to the death upon the cross" for our sins, he made the salvation of sinners consistent with divine justice, and showed us the way of "fighting the good fight of faith," and pressing forward to the conqueror's crown. Thus Jesus, who "sanctifieth," or purifies his people from guilt and sin, and consecrates them to God; and they who are thus sanctified by him, "are all of one," that is, of one father Adam; or, as speaking to the Jews, the apostle might mean Abraham. He became One with us in human nature; in order that his sufferings might atone for our sins, and that we might be justified by his righteousness: for which cause, he is "not ashamed to own us as his brethren," notwithstanding his glorious majesty and perfect holiness, and our meanness, guilt, and pollution. Thus, in a remarkable prophecy of his sufferings, and subsequent glory, he had been introduced as saying, "I will declare thy name unto my brethren," and as engaging to celebrate the praises of JEHOVAH in his church of redeemed sinners. (Note, Ps. 22:22.) In another place, where the Messiah's deliverances, victories, and kingdom were predicted under the type of David; he spake as Man, of "trusting in the Lord" amidst his trials, even as his brethren did. (Marg. Ref. p.) And by another prophet, he had said, "Behold, I, and the children, which God hath given me;" (Note, Is. 8:18.) which implied the same equality of nature and endeared affection, as the relation of brethren. Many things, in the eighth of Isaiah, are evidently prophetic of the Messiah, and as such are quoted repeatedly in the New Testament; (Notes, Is. 8:) and, no doubt, the text here adduced was understood of him, by the learned Jews. For the apostle was well acquainted with their sentiments; and would not have quoted it, in a sense different from the usual interpretation, in an argumentative discourse, without attempting to establish the new interpretation by cogent reasonings. (Note, 1:5—7.)—The quotations are all from the Septuagint, which does not materially vary from the Hebrew.

Note.—As therefore "the children," of whom Christ spake by the prophet, even his elect people whom he had undertaken to redeem, "were partakers of flesh and blood," or of human nature; he also voluntarily condescended "to partake of the same," in order that he might stand in the nearest relation to them, and so most properly become their Surety and Representative; and also be made capable of suffering and dying for them: that by so doing he might, as to them, "abolish" the reign of death, by destroying the dominion of the devil "who hath the power of death." For Satan, by seducing man into sin, first brought him under the sentence of death: every man must be exposed to the sting, the terror, the stroke, and the tremendous consequences of death, while he continues unpardoned and unconverted; and the devil, as accuser and executioner, may have much power in inflicting or aggravating these things. But the redemption of Christ made way for the deliverance of his people from Satan's bondage, and for the pardon of their sins through faith. Then the devil loses his power in respect of death also; they are delivered from its sting, its terror, and its dreadful consequences; whilst inward peace and hope reconcile them to its stroke, and the whole will terminate in their glorious resurrection to eternal life. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:55—58.) Thus Christ "delivered those, who all their life-time had been subject to bondage through fear of death." Whatever pride, ambition, and desperate passions, united with unbelief, may sometimes effect or perpetrate; the fear of death is universal, and in some degree enslaves all mankind: the juster apprehensions men have of God and eternal things, the greater must be their dread of death, and its awful consequences; except as faith in Christ deliver them. Many of those, who have been enslaved by it, during the former part of their lives, or at least from the time when they began seriously to reflect on the subject, are actually delivered from their terror by the gospel, and habitually think of dying with great composure and satisfaction. Many, who do not before rise superior to their terrors, are entirely freed from them at that critical season; and even those believers, who fear death to the last, (as some perhaps do,) will be the more amazed at their deliverance; when, by the stroke, which they dreaded all their life-time, they find themselves perfectly freed from all which they groaned under and hated; and admitted to a felicity exceeding their largest expectations.—Through death. (15) 'Had not this been added, the apostle might have seemed to speak very absurdly: for 'must God become Man, in order to conquer the devil? Assuredly, here was need rather 'of strength than weakness. The apostle therefore declares, that to render this victory 'the most glorious, it was peculiarly suitable, 'that Satan, the conqueror of man, should be 'laid prostrate by a Man; and so, by the very 'death of a Man, he might be destroyed, as by 'his own weapons.—The devil is said to have "the power of death," as from him sin sprang, 'which death followed; and as he daily tempts 'us to sin, that he may draw us with himself 'into the ruin of eternal death.—Understand 'death, as joined with the wrath of God, which 'without Christ it must necessarily be: nor can

'any thing be conceived more miserable than to be under the perpetual slavery of this dread and horror.' Beza.

17 Wherefore in all things <sup>f</sup> it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren; that he might be <sup>g</sup> a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, <sup>h</sup> to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.

18 For in that he himself hath <sup>i</sup> suffered being tempted, <sup>k</sup> he is able to succor <sup>l</sup> them that are tempted.

Note.—The introductory words of this passage are differently interpreted. Our translation explains them of our Lord's assuming, not "the nature of angels," but our nature, in order to be our Brother, Surety, and Saviour; and the mention of the seed of Abraham, from whom he descended, favors this interpretation; but the margin, and indeed a great majority of commentators, suppose the apostle to mean, that the eternal Son of God, when angels sinned, did not "take hold" of them, to preserve them from final perdition; but he "took hold" of fallen man, to rescue him from this dreadful doom: and this indeed lays the firmer foundation for the subsequent inference. "The seed of Abraham," however, on this interpretation, cannot mean all the natural descendants of Abraham, nor any of them exclusively; but must be understood of Abraham's believing seed, whether Jews or Gentiles; and this, though it accords to the apostle's manner in other places, (Rom. 4:11—25. Gal. 3:26—29.) is not thought a natural exposition in his present argument.—The difference indeed, is not great, between the two interpretations. In "laying hold" of fallen man, and not on fallen angels, the Son of God did not assume the nature of the former into personal union with his Deity; but, by a condescension still more inconceivable, he assumed human nature of "the seed of Abraham;" and this was worthy of peculiar attention; for it thus appeared, that "it behoved him," and he must, in order to the honorable salvation of sinners, whom he graciously owned as brethren, "be made like" them in the same nature, and in all those infirmities to which sin had subjected them, as far as he could be without defilement. This was needful, in order that he might become their High Priest, making atonement and reconciliation for their sins, by "the sacrifice of himself;" and so lay the foundation for his subsequent intercession for them; and that he might give them the firmest ground of assurance concerning his compassion, love, and faithfulness. (Note, Rom. 5:6—11.) For thus he, who was One with the Father as God, became One with them as Man; and so assured them that he would attend to the interests of his brethren, in the most condescending, merciful, and faithful manner; even as he would regard the glory of God the Father, before whom he acted as their High Priest. And by this voluntary humiliation, and these sufferings for them when enemies, he gave the most endearing pledge of his love to them, and taught them most emphatically, that he would not fail them, when they were brought to trust in him; and when his omnipotent arm could effect the purpose, for which he had shed his precious blood. For, "in that he suffered, being tempted" by Satan in the wilderness, and during his last conflicts; (whose unholy suggestions must have tortured his mind, in proportion as he abhorred, and could not be defiled by them;) in that he endured the severest trials from man's contemptuous malice and cruelty; and in that he bore the wrath of the Father for our sins; "he was able to succor" such as were tempted, or tried, and afflicted by God: being authorized, as Mediator, to exert omnipotence in supporting, comforting, and rescuing them; and having a sympathizing, and most tender love for them; seeing he had passed through the same temptations himself, as far as he could do it, continuing perfectly free from sin.—The ends of Christ's humiliation, death, and exaltation, are set forth in this chapter.—To "taste death for every man," to "become the Captain of our salvation," and to "lead us to glory," to "sanctify us," to "destroy death, and him that had the power of death," to deliver us from the bondage of the devil, and the fear of death, to become our "High Priest, to make reconciliation for our iniquity," having "by himself purged our sins." (1:3.) What unutterable blessings are these, flowing to us from "the grace of God, in Christ our Lord!" and what do they imply concerning the natural state of fallen man!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

The pre-eminent excellency, importance, and clearness of the gospel, and the dignity and grace of the Redeemer, concur in calling on us to "give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard:" for unless serious recollection, fervent prayer, and reverent attention, with subsequent meditation and practice, prevent; we shall surely let divine truths run out of our minds, as water from a vessel with holes. Alas! how many hearers of this kind are found in all our congregations! Indeed we are all in some measure criminal and foolish in this respect. Let us then beg of God to sanctify our memories and hearts, that we may become less forgetful, and more practical hearers of "the word of life."—The judgments of God under the new dispensation are chiefly spiritual: but they are on that account the more to be dreaded; and "if they who despised Moses' law died without mercy;" "how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation," as that which Christ has wrought for us, and revealed in his gospel? Blessed be God, this salvation is so great and perfect, that nothing, except our neglect of it, in one way or another, can exclude us from its eternal advantages; so that the trembling penitent, who is ready to think himself too criminal to be pardoned, or too polluted to be cleansed, may come to Christ with cheerful confidence, and expect from him the free gift of all which can be needful for him; and even those who are conscious of having hitherto "neglected so great salvation," may hope for the pardon of that atrocious guilt in the same manner; being assured, that "where sin hath abounded, grace shall much more abound."—Yet even partial neglects will not escape rebukes: and they whose souls are not finally ruined, often weaken their evidence, and bring darkness upon their minds, by them. Let us then mind this "one thing needful:" for, though we cannot sit at the Lord's feet, and hear instruction from his gracious lips, as they did, to whom he first began to speak the word; yet in duly attending to the writings which were left by those who thus heard him, and which have been abundantly attested to us by God himself, we shall be equally blessed with "that good part which cannot be taken from us." (Notes, Luke 10:38—42. John 20:24—29.)

V. 5—13.

The glorious God has done wonderful things for us, in creation and providence, for which, alas! we have made the basest returns: but he was "mindful of us, and visited us," in the most surprising manner, when he gave his own Son, to be "made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death," in our nature and for our salvation: that, being "crowned with glory and honor," and having all "power given to him in heaven and earth;" he might rescue every man, who believes in him, from all the effects of original and actual sin, and raise him to far higher dignity, than what was lost by Adam's transgression. (Notes, Rom. 5:12—19. 8:32—34. 1 John 4:9—12.) By the grace manifested in the incarnation of the Son of God, and the exaltation of the Son of man, the honor of our nature is eternally secured; and all our concern should be, to secure an interest in this salvation. Whatever the proud, carnal, and unbelieving may imagine or object; the spiritual mind will perceive peculiar glory in the cross of Christ; and be satisfied, that "it became him," (who in all things makes the manifestation of the glory of his own perfections his chief end,) "in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Author of their salvation perfect through sufferings." Wisdom, power, justice, holiness, truth, and love, beyond expression or conception, are displayed by our God, in that union, which was voluntarily formed between "him that sanctifieth, and them who are sanctified," when "the Word was made flesh, and tabernacled among us;" and when he, "whom all angels worship," vouchsafed to become our Brother, and to own and glory in that condescending relation to us sinful worms. And what advantages may we not expect, from so powerful and gracious a Friend and Brother? (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. John 15:12—16.)

V. 14—18.

When the divine Saviour saw "the children," whom he had undertaken to redeem, "partakers of flesh and blood:" he also was pleased to "take part of the same;" though he knew, that he must not only dwell in their nature, but bear their curse, pay their ransom, and, through death, deliver them from the old serpent, by whom sin and death entered into the world, to make havoc of the human race. (*Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Gal. 3:6—14. Phil. 2:5—11. *1 John 3:7—10.*) For "verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took upon him the seed of Abraham;" that we might be made the children of Abraham, and the friends of God through him! (Notes, Gal. 3:26—29. Jam. 2:21—24.) Let then sinners, who dread death, and use a variety of methods to banish their terrors, no longer attempt to outrave or repress them; let them not grow outrageous or licentious, through despair; nor let them expect help from the world or human inventions: but let them seek pardon, and peace, and grace, and lively hope of heaven, by faith in him who died and rose again; that, being rescued from Satan's power, they may be made superior to the fear of death, which has always hitherto held them in bondage. (Notes, Col. 1:9—14.) Let the trembling believer frequently meditate on the love of Christ, and on his cross, his sepulchre, his resurrection, and his glory; and thus, in simple dependence and obedience, let him wait for more complete deliverance "from the fear of death," and from that last enemy himself, in the Lord's appointed time. Let us all remember, that so deep was our ruin, and so heinous our guilt, that "it behoved Jesus to become in all things like unto us, that so he might be our faithful and merciful High Priest, in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of his people;" that we may come to the Father only in his name, and pleading his atonement and intercession, not in the least doubting of his faithfulness and mercy towards all "who come to God by him." And let the afflicted and tempted, instead of yielding to despondency, or giving place to the devil, (as if their harassing temptations rendered it improper for them to come to the Lord with their prayers,) remember that the Saviour "suffered being tempted," in order that he might be "able to succor them that are tempted," that he has infinite power and compassion; and that he only waits to be called in to their help, by fervent persevering prayer. May we then hear him declare to us the name of God, and teach us to celebrate his praises; and may we learn to pass through all trials and temptations, "trusting in the Lord, and staying ourselves upon our God;" that we may at length be found among those, whom the incarnate Saviour will present before the Father's throne, saying, "Behold I, and the children whom thou hast given me!" (Note, Matt. 25:34—40.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—From what had been advanced and proved, concerning the superiority of the Messiah to the angels, and his dignity as the incarnate Son of God; the apostle next took occasion to call the attention of the Hebrews to the offices, which he performed for the benefit of his church. He addressed them as “holy brethren;” either as belonging to that nation which was relatively holy, or rather as professed Christians; and “partakers of the heavenly calling,” by which the Lord from heaven called them to leave the vain pursuit of earthly things, and to “seek those things which are above.” (Notes, Phil. 3:12—14. Col. 3:1—4.) He exhorted them to consider, and attend impartially and seriously to his words respecting Jesus the Messiah, as “the Apostle and High Priest of their profession.” He had been sent by the Father as his apostle, even as he had sent others to be his apostles, or messengers from him to mankind. (Note, John 20:19—23.) In this respect, he more especially superseded Moses in his prophetic office, as the law-giver of Israel; even as, in his high priesthood, he superseded Aaron and his posterity. Of this latter office the sacred writer meant afterwards to discourse more fully: he therefore proceeded to show how superior Christ was to Moses, as it might be proved from the prophecies of his being “the Son of God.” He had been “faithful” to the Father, who had appointed him to this office; and had revealed to mankind the perfections, truths, and will of God, in the most perfect manner. Indeed, Moses had been faithful to his trust, in delivering to Israel all the commandments and statutes which God gave to him; and in ruling over the church, which might be called “his house,” or the holy habitation of JEHOVAH. (Num. 12:7.) Yet Christ must be considered as immensely superior to Moses; “for he was counted worthy,”

by the Father, “of more glory” and honor, than Moses could be entitled to; even as the builder of a house is more honorable than the building, or any part of it. Thus Moses had been only a part of “the house of God,” or a member of his household: but Christ had created him, and the whole nation; he had formed them into a church, had arranged every thing, with supreme authority, respecting their civil and religious constitution; and had given all believers among them spiritual life, grace, wisdom, and ability: so that he was, as God, the Former, Owner, and Head of the church, even before his incarnation; though in a different manner than afterwards. (Note, Phil. 2:5—8.) For, as “every house” is contrived, erected, furnished, and prepared for a habitation, by some person, whose skill and intelligence are visible in it: so “He, who built all things,” as Creator, and arranged all things in the church of Israel, could be no other than God himself. This honor the Messiah possessed; (Note, Acts 7: 37—43.) and this glorious Person had at length appeared in human nature, as the Apostle, or Prophet, of the Father, to introduce a new dispensation, and terminate the old one. In still plainer language, Moses had been “faithful, as a servant, in the house” of the Lord, to introduce the legal dispensation, which prefigured and bore witness to those things, that were to be more clearly revealed in future times: but Christ was faithful “as a Son,” possessing authority “over his own house.” For the church belonged to him, as it did unto the Father; though he voluntarily acted as the Prophet of the Father to mankind. This spiritual house consisted of those, who had been given to him and redeemed by him; and who were called by his grace, and “made an habitation of God through the Spirit;” so that the apostle, and the Hebrews professing the gospel, whom he immediately addressed, were a part of that sacred temple, in which God would delight to dwell, to manifest his presence, and to communicate his blessings for ever. (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) This would be their felicity, if they “held fast their confidence” in Christ, their “hope” of salvation by him, and their “joy” and glorying in him; and were firm and steadfast in dependence on him, and obedience to him, amidst the various temptations and persecutions, to which this would expose them; as this perseverance would be the proper evidence of their sincerity. (Notes, 14—19. 10:35—39. Rom. 5:3—5.)—“The government of the Christian church is entirely committed to the Lord Jesus; and he, as supreme Head and Lord of ‘all, ... governs both it, and all things in earth and heaven, for the good of it: and therefore, ‘if he be not truly God, God doth not now govern the world, ... but hath given up the administration of it to a creature.’ Whitby.—The words translated “made all things,” may rather relate to the formation of the church, than to the creation of the world: yet there can be no reasonable doubt, that the apostle purposely intimated, that he who formed the church, also created the world: and certainly he asserted that Christ, whether as Former and Ruler of the church, or Creator of all things, is God.—Faithful. (2) Faithfulness to God who appoints, and tenderness to man for whom he is appointed, are the two great qualifications, laid down as a requisite in the High Priest, here and elsewhere. (2:17. 4:15. 5:2—8.) He was made perfect, as to the latter, by his assumption of our nature, and his sufferings in it. His Deity, as One with the Father, secured the former.—He faithfully maintained the honor and rights of God, in every part of his salvation; he was faithful in the whole revelation, which he made to us of God and his will; and in performing whatever he was sent into the world to accomplish, for rendering the salvation of man consistent with the honor of God.

9 When your fathers tempted me, provoked me, <sup>7</sup> and saw my works <sup>8</sup> forty years.

10 Wherefore, <sup>9</sup> I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do alway <sup>10</sup> err in their heart, and <sup>11</sup> they have not known my ways.

Notc.—This address was directed to those professed Christians, who were in danger of apostatizing, or who did not seem in earnest in their religion; but it was likewise peculiarly suited to excite the attention of such Jews also, as might read it. The example of their unbelieving progenitors, and the words of their own scriptures respecting them, were adduced with great propriety, and power of conviction, on this occasion. (Notes, Ps. 95:7—11).—The warning, given by the Holy Spirit in the days of David, with reference to more ancient events, was equally applicable to the Jews in the days of the apostle. On that very day, which might terminate their lives, or the season of the Lord's long-suffering, or deprive them of the means of grace, they were urgently entreated, to attend to the voice of God in obedient faith, if they ever meant to obtain his favor and escape his wrath; and not obstinately to "harden their hearts," and stupify their consciences in wilful sin, or by carnal prejudices and pleasures. This their fathers had done, "in the provocation" of JEHOVAH, which had taken place "in the wilderness;" when, after all the demonstrations of his power, and goodness to them, they ungratefully wearied out his patience by their aggravated rebellions. That season was peculiarly "the day of temptation;" for their fathers acted as if they meant to try, how much provocation God would bear, before he took vengeance upon them. (Notes, Ex. 17:1,2. Matt. 4:5—7.) Wherefore he was at length so angered and grieved by their perverse returns for his manifold favors, that he would no longer bear with that generation of Israel. For he said of them, "They do always err in their hearts:" their wicked hearts always led them to depart from him; as they had never approved and chosen his holy ways, but had always preferred their own evil devices. He therefore irrevocably determined, and confirmed it by an oath, that they should never enter into the rest of Canaan, the type of heavenly felicity. (Notes, Num. 14:20—45.) It therefore was incumbent upon the Hebrews, whom the writer addressed, to look well to themselves, lest there should be in any of them the same "evil" or wicked "heart," the same proud, carnal, rebellious, and ungrateful temper, whence the unbelief of their ancestors had originated; and lest this should be manifested by their "apostatizing from the living God;" either from the first rejecting Christianity, or afterwards renouncing it: for in both cases, they would be deemed apostates from the living God, who now spoke to them by his beloved Son, and in no other way; and they would be punished accordingly, though they still professed to worship the God of their fathers. To prevent this, they ought also day after day, "to exhort one another" to embrace and adhere to the gospel of Christ; while the time of their personal and national probation continued: (Notes, Luke 19:41—44. John 12:34—36.) as they would shortly cease to be the people of God; and that generation was about to be visited in a far more tremendous manner, than their fathers had been in the wilderness. This was needful to them all, "lest any one of them should be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin;" for their sinful propensities tended to deceive them into a persuasion, that satisfaction and impunity might be found in the world and in disobedience; and that the self-denial and suffering, connected with Christianity, were unnecessary and intolerable. Thus they would delude them into negligence, procrastination, and sinful indulgence; which, producing frequent violations of the light of their own consciences, would gradually render them callous; and God might thus be provoked to give them up to fatal delusions, or final obduracy. (Notes, Ex. 4:21. 8:15. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)—(Seeing Moses, the 'servant, could not be despised with impunity; 'let them consider what punishment they must endure, if they despised the Son of God, to 'whom Moses himself invites them.' Beza. (Notes, 10:26—31. 12:22—25.) The apostle's reasoning, like that of Stephen, (Notes, Acts 7:37—53.) was suited to show, that the fathers of the Jewish nation had, in every age, been prone to "resist the Holy Spirit," and those who spake by him. This had excluded the generation which came out of Egypt from Canaan, in the days of Moses: David, many ages after, was inspired by the Holy Spirit, to warn the Israelites against imitating their unbelieving progenitors, and forfeiting spiritual blessings; and the writer of the epistle warns his contemporaries, not to exclude themselves from heaven, in the same manner, as their ancestors were excluded from Canaan. In this view, there is a vast energy in the warning and exhortation.—As the Holy Ghost saith. (7) How decidedly this attests the book of Psalms to be the word of God; and not merely of David, or any other man! (Notes, 2 Sam. 23:1, 2. Mark 12:35—37.) The quotation is almost verbatim from the Septuagint, which well translates the Hebrew. (Ps. 95:7—11.)

14 For <sup>a</sup> we are made partakers of Christ, <sup>r</sup> if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end;

16 For <sup>t</sup> some, when they had heard, did provoke: howbeit <sup>u</sup> not all that came out of Egypt by Moses.

17 But <sup>x</sup> with whom was he grieved forty years? <sup>y</sup> was it not with them that had sinned, <sup>z</sup> whose carcasses fell in the wilderness?

18 And <sup>a</sup> to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, <sup>b</sup> but to them that believed not?

19 So we see that <sup>c</sup> they could not enter in because of unbelief.

Note.—Those who professed the gospel were "made partakers of Christ," and of all the blessings of his kingdom and salvation; provided they maintained "the beginning of their confidence," (or their subsistence in him by faith,) "steadfast unto the end;" and thus showed that they really were what they appeared to be. (Notes, Col. 1:21—23. 1 John 1:3, 4.) Considering, therefore, the immense advantages of perseverance, and the tremendous consequences of apostacy; they should consider the words of the Holy Spirit as addressed immediately to themselves. For, though the whole nation of Israel had been brought out of Egypt, to hear the will of God from Moses; yet some of them (how vast a proportion it was not necessary to state,) provoked God to exclude them from Canaan. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10:1—10. Jude 5—8.) There were however some exceptions, even in that devoted generation; as Joshua and Caleb, and some of the Levites, and of the women: (Note, Num. 14:27—30.) and thus, in the apostle's time, a remnant of Jews believed in Christ, whilst the bulk of the nation were about to perish in unbelief. (Note, Rom. 11:1—6.) Yet God had not failed of performing his promises, when he excluded that generation from Canaan; neither was this inconsistent with his justice: for "with whom was he grieved," but with those obstinate transgressors who always rebelled against him? He therefore cut them off, and their dead bodies lay by heaps in the wilderness; while his promises were performed to the remnant of believers, and to the children of the rebels, as they would also be in the present case. (Notes, Ps. 90: Title 7—17.) In that particular instance, when "he sware in his wrath, that they should not enter into his rest;" the tremendous sentence included none but the unbelievers: so that they could not enter into Canaan, "because of their unbelief;" nor could the Hebrews, whom the writer addressed, by any possible means enter heaven, unless they believed in Jesus Christ.—While it is said, &c. (15) 'This sentence is noble; from which we learn, 'that the words of the prophets did not pertain 'to that one time; but that God, even at this day, 'invites us to himself, by setting the writings 'of the prophets before us.' Beza. This is directly opposite to the conduct of many modern expositors and theologians, who labor strenuously to prove, that the language of the sacred writers, in many places, was intended for certain descriptions of persons in their own time; and is but little, if at all, applicable to us, who are placed in very different circumstances. But, in reality, it is of comparatively small importance to us, as to religion, what the meaning of any passage in scripture may be; if we are not concerned in it, and can, in our situation, de-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

All who hear and profess the gospel should be "holy brethren:" and all who are "partakers of the heavenly calling," will be sanctified, and united in love, according to their measure of faith. This "calling is from heaven," and brings men thither: yet we all need to be excited to "consider" more frequently and attentively the condescending "Apostle" and compassionate "High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus:" and every renewed contemplation of his Person and his salvation, will suggest new instructions, or new motives to love, confidence, and obedience.—The stewards and servants of God are required to be faithful in all things intrusted to them, and many have been approved as such by their common Lord. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:1,2. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.) But the eternal Son of God is "counted worthy of more honor," than any or all of his servants: they are only a part of the spiritual house, of which he is the great Builder, Proprietor, and Ruler: and his new creation of the church as really proclaims "his eternal power and Godhead," as his formation and upholding of the universe. As therefore they are most absurd, who allow "every house to be builded of some man," and yet atheistically ascribe the glorious creation around them to chance or necessity; so they reason little, if at all better, who allow "Christ to be the Author of life, holiness, wisdom, strength, and salvation, to the multitudes of his people, and yet deny his real Deity." All prophets and apostles acted as servants "in the house" of another, to bear testimony to Christ, and to honor him; but he appeared, to direct and govern all things, with unlimited sovereignty, as "a Son over his own house." May we then belong to his spiritual building; and manifest that we do so, by "holding fast our confidence, and the rejoicing of our hope" in Christ, steadfast, through all trials, even to the end! (Notes, Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.)

V. 7—19.

Alas! what numbers of professed Christians are as far from the power of true religion, as the Israelites were in the days of Moses, or the Jews in those of St. Paul! The Holy Spirit therefore still says to them: "To-day if ye will hear the voice of God," and "submit to his righteousness, and authority, do not harden your hearts."—While sinners are procrastinating, God may be about to say, "This night shall your souls be required of you." (Notes, Luke 12:15—21. 13:22—30.) How infatuated then must they be, to close their eyes and harden their hearts against conviction, to run into dissipation and worldly lusts, to yield to sloth, and to make delays, in such a perilous situation! (Note, Prov. 6:1—5.) Thus, like the ancient rebels in Israel, vast numbers provoke and tempt God, till, being grieved by their obstinacy, and their carnal enmity to him and his ways, "he swears in his wrath that they shall never enter into his rest." Let then such triflers and loiterers, on the brink of the bottomless pit, look well to themselves; for evil is before them. Let them remember that their unbelief springs from the wickedness of their hearts: for they must be conscious that their excuses, their delays, and even their objections to doctrines and preachers, arise from covetousness, or sensuality; from pride, the love of the world, and an aversion to the life of faith and holiness.—We all, however, have need to exhort one another daily, or while the day of life and grace continues, lest sin should first deceive, and then harden us; till negligences and offences, in lighter things, terminate in more daring crimes, or open apostacy.—The happiness of being "partakers of Christ," as our complete Salvation and eternal Portion, and the fear of God's wrath and eternal misery, combine to put us upon our guard against hypocrisy and apostacy, and to excite us to persevere in the life of obedient faith. Let us then beware of trusting to outward privileges or profession; remembering that unbelief and disobedience will exclude men from God's promised rest, and that nothing else can do it: and let us pray to be numbered with that remnant of believers, who will enter heaven, when all others shall be refused admission "because of their unbelief."

gent self-examining attention, to every means of grace, and a careful watchfulness against temptation, lest they should fall under a still more terrible condemnation. "A promise" indeed of "entering into rest," under the Messiah and in heaven, had been left them in the scriptures, as a legacy from their believing progenitors, for whose sake they had been thus favored; and they were earnestly invited, by the preaching of the gospel, to partake of that promised benefit: but it behoved them to fear, "lest any of them should appear to come short of it," and so be excluded from heaven, as their fathers had been from Canaan. Nay, they ought to fear, lest they should seem to themselves, or to others, to be in danger of doing this, either during their lives, or when death approached; and this must be the case, if they rejected or renounced the gospel; and would probably be so, if they grew remiss or wavering in the profession of it. "The glad tidings," of entering into this rest, had been preached to them, even as they had more obscurely been declared to their fathers; whose unbelief and consequent disobedience had excluded them from Canaan, and from that better "rest" of heaven typified by it. For the "word of hearing had not profited them," "not being mixed with faith," or joined by the faith "of those who heard it." The ancient Israelites were destitute of faith, by which they might receive the word spoken by Moses into their hearts, for the appropriation of the benefit, so as to render it a principle of obedience: and, in like manner, the clearer revelation of the gospel would be unprofitable to the Hebrews; unless they had faith in it, and thus received it in a dependent and obedient manner. Of all that vast multitude, which fell in the wilderness, not one came short of Canaan, by the power of any enemy; or because of his past sins, or present weakness; or for any other cause, except the want of true faith: and none who hear the gospel are excluded from heaven, on any account whatever, except through unbelief. He proves ... that 'the promise to give Abraham and his Seed the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, 'was really a promise to give believers, of all 'nations, the everlasting possession of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the emblem: and that the oath which excluded the 'rebellious Israelites in the wilderness from 'Canaan, likewise excluded from the heavenly 'country all that continue in their sins. So that, 'in this ancient oracle, a future state, with its 'rewards and punishments, was actually made 'known to the Jews.' Macknight.

7 Again, he limiteth a certain day, <sup>t</sup> saying in David, <sup>u</sup> To-day, <sup>x</sup> after so long a time: as it is said, To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts.

11 <sup>c</sup> Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest, <sup>f</sup> lest any man fall after the same example of § unbelief. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle laid it down as a principle, that "those who believe," and they only, "enter into rest," even that rest which was especially intended. They have the title to that inheritance, and earnest of it, in peace with God and confidence in him, delight in his love and service, hope and joy through the power of the Holy Spirit, and a full persuasion that happiness can only be found in the favor and salvation of the Lord Jesus. (Notes, Ps. 116: 7. Jer. 6:16,17. Matt. 11:28—30. Rom. 5:1—5.) It was evident that more than 'the rest of Canaan' was meant, in the scriptures to which he referred; as God had said, "if they shall enter into my rest," with allusion to the sabbath; though, the works of creation from which he ceased, and in which he rested with infinite satisfaction, as being "very good," had been "finished from the foundation of the world;" above two thousand five hundred years before he spake thus of the unbelieving Israelites: for it was thus written in a passage of scripture well known to the Hebrews, concerning the original institution of the sabbath.

(Notes, Gen. 2:1,2. Ex. 20:11. 31:13—17.) And yet God said so many ages after, that they "should not enter into his rest." (Note, Num. 14:27—30.) This implied that the rest of Israel, in Canaan, was a type of a more spiritual and sacred rest, satisfaction, and felicity, in him and his glory, (in some degree resembling his own complacency in the perfect work of creation,) which would be conferred on his believing people. The exclusion of the generation from Canaan, to whom that rest was first preached, or proposed as glad tidings, implied that it remained for some others to enter in, which their posterity accordingly did; and the language denoted, that, while, through unbelief, numbers came short of the better rest of heaven, yet, it was purposed that some should enter into it by faith. In confirmation of which, another day was limited, "by the Holy Spirit in David," many ages afterwards, during which believers would "enter into rest," but after which unbelievers would be irrevocably excluded. (Note, 3:7—13.) This was addressed to those, who were actually in possession of the promised land, and at the height of their prosperity as a nation; it therefore evidently related to another and better rest than that of Canaan; from which unbelief would exclude even the inhabitants of that good land. For if "Jesus," (or Joshua, as it would have been better rendered, to prevent mistake and ambiguity,) had given Israel the true rest intended for believers; God would not so long after have spoken "of another day." Joshua had indeed given Israel rest, from the fatigues and wanderings of the desert, and from the hardships and perils of war, by their settlement in Canaan; (Note, Josh. 23:1.) yet there evidently "remained for the people of God" another and better rest, even the keeping of a perpetual and most blessed sabbath; for the word is changed, to express the idea the more strongly. This was reserved for them in heaven, where they have done with sin, temptation, pain, conflict, fear, death, labor, and disappointment; and enjoy uninterrupted, unalloyed, ineffable, and eternal delight, in God and his holy worship and service.—This point the apostle argued from the Old Testament so carefully, because the Sadducees entirely denied, that any better recompense than temporal prosperity was to be expected; and the Jews in general were prone to overlook the spiritual blessings proposed to them, in the promises made to their fathers, and to confine their thoughts wholly to the temporal sanctions of the national covenant, made with them at mount Sinai. (Note, Ex. 19:1.)—The sacred writer therefore added, that "he who had entered into his rest," had ceased from his own works, in which he had previously been occupied; even as God ceased from creating, when he rested on the sabbath day.—Thus Jesus, the Messiah, had finished his work on earth, and had entered into his rest in heaven, as "the Forerunner" of his people: thus the souls of the righteous have ceased from their self-denying labors, and are enjoying their gracious recompense: and thus the believer, when brought to rest in the mercy and love of God, through Jesus Christ, ceases from all his allowed works of sin and folly, as well as from his vain endeavors to "establish his own righteousness," or to effect his own happiness.—As such blessings, therefore, were most certainly attainable by those who diligently sought them; and as the promised rest would so abundantly repay all their previous hardships and conflicts; it behoved them "to labor" in the use of all appointed means, and in the persevering attendance on every duty, "to enter into this rest," and to obtain the assurance and earnest of it; fearing, lest any one of them should fall under condemnation, "after the same example of unbelief," by which their ancestors had been excluded from Canaan. The application, by the singular pronoun, is rendered a warning to each individual.—The apostle's reasoning, from the Old Testament, concerning another rest, entirely distinct from the rest in Canaan; even "the keeping of a sabbath reserved for the people of God," which unbelievers even in Canaan came short of, is conclusive against all those moderns, who labor to prove, that the doctrine of a future state of righteous retribution was no part of the religion of Israel, as well as against the ancient Sadducees. The proof of this doctrine, from comparing two passages in the books of Moses, with one in the Psalms, is as clear and conclusive, as our Lord's proof of the resurrection, by what JEHOVAH said to Moses from the bush: (Note, Matt. 22:22—33.) and probably the apostle knew the Pharisees in general would have allowed, that all who rejected it "erred, not knowing the scriptures."

Note.—It has been greatly controverted, whether the Holy scriptures, or the personal "Word of God," be spoken of in these verses: but St. Paul never calls our Lord by that title; and it appears to me, that the apostle meant the written word; and that he made a gradual transition from the word spoken, to him who spake it.—The Hebrews should not be surprised, to find such deep and interesting truths couched under the typical events of their history, or contained in other parts of their scriptures; for these were "the word of God." This is no lifeless, feeble, or formal instruction, like the traditions and glosses of the scribes: but it is "quick and powerful," a "living," active, energetic word: suited to be the instrument of the Holy Spirit, in "quicken[ing] those who are dead in sin," and in awakening, convincing, and alarming the most careless and insensible of mankind. (Note, Jer. 23:28,29.) It is even "sharper than any two-edged sword," which would cut each way: for it can pierce the heart and conscience, like the irresistible lightning; forcing convictions and alarms upon the most haughty and obstinate; showing men their past and present sins, in all their odiousness, numberless multitude, and manifold aggravations; detecting the unsuspected pride, enmity, rebellion, ingratitude, and other evils of the heart; distinguishing men's characters with the clearest evidence, and exposing the base motives of their most specious actions. Thus, by exhibiting the glory of the divine perfections, men's relations and obligations to the great Creator; the spirituality, extent, excellency, and sanction of the law; the evil and desert of sin, and the depravity of the human heart, in a variety of ways, and a multiplicity of experiments; it forces conviction of guilt and danger upon the sinner, and compels him, as it were, to condemn himself and seek deliverance: nor can any kind of delusion or hypocrisy stand before its penetrating energy, when experimentally and fully preached, and applied to the hearts of men according to their various characters. It is, as it were, a sword, which can pierce so deep, and cut so keenly, as to divide between "soul and spirit;" and to penetrate the joints and marrow, which no other sword can reach: being, in plain language, a "discerner" of men's most secret thoughts and intentions; so that it often shows them their most hidden purposes, and makes them afraid of being openly named and exposed; as if the preacher knew their hearts, far better than they did themselves, and had a register before him even of those sins which they have forgotten. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, Matt. 7:28,29. John 8:3—11. 1 Cor. 14:20, 25. 2 Cor. 4:1,2. 10:1—6.) Thus "the word of God," is "the sword of the Spirit," in the hands of Christ, as well as in the hands of his people. (Notes, Is. 11:2—5. Rev. 1:12—20. 2:14—16.) For the Lord himself is the Speaker, when his own word is properly declared and applied: he discerns, and by his word detects, the "thoughts and intents of the heart;" nor "is there any creature," who is not wholly manifest in every respect in his sight; before whom "all things are naked," as stripped of all disguise; "and opened," being fully understood by him "with whom we have to do," as with our Lawgiver and Judge, and to whom we must at length render an account of all our conduct, and of all our most secret thoughts, motives, and intentions.—The expressions "naked and opened," are supposed to refer to the sacrifices, which were flayed, and opened, and cleft down the chine; and then every part of the body and of the intestines which were before concealed, were exposed to the exact inspection of the priest.

14 Seeing then that we have <sup>o</sup> a great High Priest, <sup>p</sup> that is passed into the heavens, <sup>q</sup> Jesus the Son of God, <sup>r</sup> let us hold fast our profession.

15 For <sup>s</sup> we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points <sup>t</sup> tempted like as we are, <sup>u</sup> yet without sin.

16 Let us therefore <sup>x</sup> come boldly unto <sup>y</sup> the throne of grace, that we may <sup>z</sup> obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

Note.—As conviction and condemnation must be inevitable to sinners, before an omniscient Judge, whose "living and powerful word" forces men even here to condemn themselves; (Note, 1 John 3:18—24.) it was the more needful for the Hebrews to regard the "great High Priest," whom he was recommending to them, "even Jesus the Son of God." For he, having appeared in human nature, as in the court of the sanctuary, to offer his atoning sacrifice; had passed "into the heavens," the immediate presence of the Father; as the high priest passed through the first sanctuary into the holiest of all, to sprinkle the blood, and burn the incense, on the great day of expiation. (Notes, Lev. 16:11—22.) It also behoved them to hold fast "the profession" of the gospel, and that confession of faith in Christ, which they had made when baptized, amidst all possible dangers and persecutions. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) For "they had not a High Priest," who disregarded, or could not sympathize with them in their pains and sufferings for his sake; or who would make no allowance for their infirmities, or refuse assistance in their temptations. But they had One, who, to procure their pardon and salvation, had voluntarily submitted to be tried and "tempted," even as they were; as far as he could be, without a sinful nature, or the least sin in his life: and this exemption was needful, in order that he might be their Sacrifice and their Advocate. (Notes, 2:16—18. 7:23—25.) As, therefore, there was a mercy-seat above the ark of the covenant, in the most holy place, before which the high priest once a year appeared in behalf of the people, and over which the glory of God was displayed, as propitious to them; even so God the Father was, as it were, placed on "a throne of grace," "a mercy-seat," in the heavenly sanctuary, before which Jesus appeared as "the High Priest" of his people, through whom God waited to receive petitions, to grant pardons, and to communi-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Blessed be God, that "the gospel is preached to us," even as to the primitive Christians, and far more clearly than to Israel of old. "Exceedingly great and precious promises" are "given to us," of entering into "the heavenly rest;" yet we should "rejoice with trembling" in our outward advantages; lest any of us should be found at last to come short of the blessing, and to sink under proportionably deeper condemnation, through unbelief. Nay, it is a very dreadful consequence of a wavering profession, or an inconsistent or negligent conduct, that it often causes men to "seem to come short," even when they are launching into eternity: they leave the world in gloomy doubt, and their survivors in distressing uncertainty, whether they are gone to heaven or to hell. Let us then "give diligence, that we may have an abundant entrance ministered to us into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord." (Note, 2 Pet. 1:10, 11.)—Under every dispensation, God has declared man's rest to be in him, and in his love, as the only suitable and sufficient happiness of the soul; and faith in his promises, through his Son, as the only way of "entering into that rest." His rich mercy, the plenteous redemption of Christ, and the word of the gospel, will not profit those, who do not unite faith with his gracious proposals; for many have heard and professed the truth, who are even now finally excluded from the promised "rest because of unbelief;" their state is determined, and all their sabbaths and ordinances have only served to increase their condemnation. Many thousands join them every day, to whom, could we address them, we could only say, "Had you attended yesterday, it might have been well; but now it is forever too late." To survivors, however, we may still say, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice;" and the present is "an accepted time, and a day of salvation." (Note, 2 Cor. 6:1, 2.) Many, also, are continually entering into the earnest and beginning of this rest by faith; and others into the full possession of it, 550]

by dying in the Lord. Then they have done with all their sorrows, sins, and temptations; and their groans and tears are exchanged for unalloyed and perfect serenity and satisfaction. Let sinners then "labor to enter into this rest," "lest they should fall after the example" of ancient unbelievers, and perish with heaven before their eyes: let believers abide in Christ by faith and obedience, and learn to delight in his holy day and sacred ordinances, as earnest of their expected eternal sabbath, and preparations for it: let them bear up under fatigues and hardships, in the prospect of heavenly rest; and, if ever drawn aside, let them recollect these things, and say to themselves, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." (Note, Ps. 116:7. P. O. 1—9.)

V. 12—16.

While we find, by experience, that "the word of God is living and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword," to penetrate the heart and conscience; let us remember, that the Lord himself is the "Discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart," before whom "all creatures are manifest," and "all things are naked and opened." (Note, Rev. 2: 20—23.) "With him we have to do," and to him we are accountable: and if, under faithful preaching, we find our hearts condemn us, we are sure that "God is greater than our hearts, and knoweth all things." Instead therefore of objecting to a heart-searching ministry, and choosing such lifeless, feeble instructions, as are more like a shaken reed, than "a two-edged sword," let us lay open our inmost souls to the piercing strokes of the distinguishing word of God; that we may learn our need of that great High Priest, even the Son of God, who now pleads for us before his Father's throne in heaven. In proportion as we know and condemn ourselves, and abhor our sins; he will become more and more precious to our souls, and we shall cleave to him more constantly. The thoughts of the holiness and heart-searching knowledge of God, and our consciousness of guilt and infirmity, will endear to us the Redeemer's condescension and compassion; and we shall rejoice that he can be "touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and that 'he knows what sore temptations mean,' though he was perfectly free from sin. Let us then approach continually to "the throne of grace," where our reconciled God deems it his peculiar honor to pardon rebels, and to answer the prayers of those who supplicate his favor in the name of his beloved Son: let us improve the day of his patience, and approach in his appointed way; let us come with believing boldness, as well as with adoring reverence and humble repentance; let us seek for mercy to pardon our sins, to compassionate our miseries, and to supply our necessities; and let us supplicate grace sufficient for us, in all our trials and temptations, and to enable us for the service of every day: thus waiting, as humble pensioners, at "the throne of grace," which is our best preparation for appearing before the tribunal of our omniscient and holy Judge.

CHAP. V.

The nature of the Aaronic high priesthood, and the requisite call and qualifications for it, are stated, 1—4; in order to show the pre-eminence of Christ, as a "High Priest after the order of Melchisedek," 5—10. A reproof of the Hebrews for their small proficiency in Christianity, 11—14.

3 And by reason hereof he ought, <sup>i</sup> as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins.

Note.—In order more fully to show the nature and efficacy of the high priesthood of Christ, the apostle made some introductory observations on that of Aaron; which tended to manifest its insufficiency, and to point out its typical meaning, as well as to illustrate his subject. "Every high priest," selected from among men, was "ordained" and appointed for the benefit of men, in "things pertaining to God," or the great concerns of religion. That office required him who sustained it, to present before God the oblations and sin-offerings of the people: nor would he accept of any services, which were not offered in that way: and this continually testified, that sinners were unworthy to approach their offended Creator, save through an expiatory sacrifice and an intercessor. (Notes, Ex. 28:1. Lev. 16:17. Num. 16:45—50. 18:1.) The high priest was indeed the head of the whole priesthood; but all the other priests descended from Aaron, who had first obtained this office in Israel, and in some sense, were one with him. It was, moreover, proper that the high priest should be capable of "compassionating," in a proportionate and reasonable manner, his brethren, who had sinned through ignorance and infirmity; or who were drawn aside from the right path, by any seducer, or seduction, for which things especially the sin-offerings were appointed. (Notes and P. O. Lev. 4: Notes, 5:1—6. 16:2—16. Ps. 19:12—14.) Now this was provided for, by ordaining men of like passions with others to that office; who, "being compassed with" natural and moral "infirmities," were as liable to mistake or sin, as they. It was therefore prescribed, that they should offer sacrifices for their own sins, as well as for those of the people; which was a plain intimation, that they could only be typical high priests, being not worthy to appear before God in their own cause, but with the shedding of blood. (Notes, 7:26—28. 9:24—26. 10:1—10. Lev. 9: P. O.) Nor might any man assume this honorable office, of his own will, or by human appointment; but it was confined to those, whom God expressly called to the execution of it, as he did Aaron and his posterity after him: and if any one else presumed to perform the least part of its peculiar duties, he did it at the hazard of his life; which showed, that it derived all its efficacy from the appointment of God, and not from its own intrinsic value.

Can have compassion. (2) Μετριοπαθεῖν δυνάμενος.—"Can reasonably bear with." Marg. Here only. To feel moderately; so as to make proper allowances, without conniving at wilful sins.—Them that are out of the way.] Ἰλασόμενος. 3:10.

5 So also <sup>k</sup> Christ glorified not himself to be made an High Priest; but he that said unto him, <sup>l</sup> Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee.

Note.—According to these prefigurations, Christ had not taken honor to himself, by acting as the High Priest of his people, without express warrant: but the Father had in the Old Testament openly declared that the Messiah should sustain that office; for, as he said in one place, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," when announcing his decree concerning the Messiah's kingdom; (Notes, 1:5—7. Ps. 2:7—9.) so had he as expressly made known his appointment to the priesthood in another prophecy. (Notes, 7—10. 6:16—20. 7:1—22. Ps. 110:4.) But the Jews had paid far more regard to the predictions of his kingdom, than to those of his priesthood, through their prejudices for the Levitical law.—Some expositors, interpreting the expression, "This day have I begotten thee," of Christ's resurrection; (though that was only the proof, and not in any sense the cause or origin of his Sonship; (Note, Acts 13:24—37.) have argued, that he did not officiate as a Priest, till after he arose from the dead; as if offering himself as a Sacrifice for sin was no part of his priestly office! But the typical meaning of the legal ceremonies will sufficiently expose the gross absurdity of this supposition, as we proceed with the subject.—The quotations are from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew. (Ps. 2:7. 110:4.)

Note.—Our Lord, though perfectly free from all sin, came as near to the condition of a sinner as he possibly could. He was “compassed about” with the sinless infirmities of our frail nature; he “appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh;” he was dealt with as a sinner, both by God and man; he endured the most violent temptations, sufferings, and agonies; and even his soul was full of consternation, and of horror unspeakable. This was “in the days of his flesh,” subsequent to his incarnation; and previous to his exaltation; when his human nature became incapable of suffering, and was made inconceivably glorious. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—54. Phil. 3:20,21.) His humiliation and distresses were extreme in his agony in the garden. (Notes, Matt. 26:36—46. Luke 22:36—46.) Then especially he offered up to his Father most earnest “prayers and supplications,” accompanied “with strong cries and tears,” as vehement expressions of his inward anguish: he addressed himself to God, “as able to save him from death, and he was heard,” and answered, “because of his piety,” his reverence of the divine Majesty, his love, and his zeal for the glory of the Father: or, as many commentators explain it, “He was heard, and delivered from his fear.” No doubt the most distressing dread of that awful wrath of God against our sins, which he had undertaken to endure, was one cause of our Lord’s agony in the garden. This might well oppress his human soul, without his having the least apprehension, that he should finally sink under it, or come short of “the joy set before him;” or the least distrust of the Father’s faithfulness to his engagement;—without any defect in his patience and submission, or any degree of sin. For the prospect of the temporary and even transient enduring of such a load of guilt and wrath was sufficient to excite the most overwhelming consternation. (Note, John 12:27—33.)—Thus, it appeared, that he had communion with his brethren in the passion, or feeling, most foreign to the divine nature, even fear, which is never ascribed to God, as many others are; and that he could sympathize with them in it, and deliver them from it. And, indeed, though he was not delivered from dying; though “the cup did not pass from him,” but he willingly submitted to drink it; yet he was delivered from that agonizing terror, which dictated his “supplications with strong crying and tears;” and was afterwards calm and composed under his heaviest sufferings.—Learned men have clearly shown, by pertinent examples, that the words may well bear this sense: and it seems more exactly to suit the apostle’s argument. Our Lord was not indeed spared, or exempted from any part of his expiatory sufferings, concerning which he said, notwithstanding the strong reluctance of his holy human nature to such exquisite and complicated sufferings, “Thy will be done;” knowing that it was “not possible for that cup to pass from him,” consistently with the glory of the Father, and the salvation of his people. Yet the horror of his mind was allayed, he was strengthened to support the immense weight of suffering which was laid upon him; his sacrifice was accepted for his people; he was raised from the dead, exalted to the mediatorial throne, and invested with the power of “saving to the uttermost all who come to God through him.” Even when “the Son of God” himself was appointed to the high priesthood, he learned the difficulty of obeying the divine commandments, in the present circumstances of human nature, amidst the temptations and trials to which men are exposed: of this he acquired an experimental knowledge, as far as could consist with sinless perfection; and even his perfect obedience became more exalted and honorable, through his whole life, by the enlargement of his human powers, and by the things which he suffered; so that his zeal and love were never so admirable and astonishing, as when he agonized in the garden, and hung upon the cross. Thus by his appointment to the high priesthood, by the obedience which he finished amidst sufferings and unto death, by the efficacy of his sacrifice, and by his subsequent exaltation, “he was made perfect,” as Mediator, being fully authorized and qualified for his gracious work; and so he became “the Author of eternal salvation to all those” of the whole human race, “who obey” his call to repentance, to faith, and to take his yoke upon them; mercifully giving them all things pertaining to that deliverance, as the purchase of his own blood, and leading them forth to all those conflicts and services, which are connected with their “laying hold of eternal life.” For all this springs from his having been nominated, and acknowledged by God, “as a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek;” a King as well as a High Priest, and so of a nobler order than that of Aaron. (Notes, 5,6. Gen. 14:18—20. Ps. 110:4. Zech. 6:12,13.)—It is observable, that Melchisedek is never mentioned in the Old Testament, after the account of his meeting with Abraham, as recorded in Genesis; except in the hundred and tenth Psalm: and never in the New Testament, except in the apostle’s argument in this epistle concerning the high priesthood of Christ; a subject of infinite importance, and proved beyond all reasonable doubt, by this single argument. (Notes, 7:1—22.) How much may depend on a detached testimony of scripture, which superficial readers pass over unobserved, and to which perhaps very few carefully attend!

Note.—Concerning Christ, as “a High Priest after the order of Melchisedek,” the apostle intended to discourse more fully: but the things which he had to say of him were such, that it would be difficult to state them in a proper manner: not so much because they were in themselves abstruse, as because the Hebrews were dull of hearing, through their prejudiced attachment to the Levitical law and priesthood. Though they had heard and professed the gospel so long, that it might have been expected they would have been capable of instructing others, in the great doctrine of redemption by Christ; they had so closed their minds to the truth, or turned aside from the purity of the faith, that they wanted some one to teach them anew the very rudiments of that religion, which was contained in “the oracles of God,” or the Old Testament, when rightly understood. (Notes, Acts 7:37—43. Rom. 3:1,2. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) They were become such Christians, as had need to be fed with milk, or to be taught the plainest and most obvious truths of the gospel; being incapable of receiving and profiting by its deeper and more spiritual doctrines. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) Indeed every man, who could only receive the simpler and more common truths of religion, without applying his mind to the more experimental and exalted parts of it; must be considered as a babe in Christ, how long soever he had professed the gospel, being evidently “unskilful in the word of righteousness.” But the more sublime doctrines of Christianity, which immediately related to the counsels of God for his own glory, and the display of his perfections by the redemption of Christ, and which indeed were obscurely intimated in the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, were as “strong meat” for those who were matured in knowledge, judgment, and experience; being the proper nourishment of their faith, hope, love, and spiritual affections. For such Christians, “by reason of use,” or habit, acquired by assiduous meditation and unbiassed attention to the truth, had attained to a spiritual taste and relish for divine excellency; they had their spiritual “senses exercised to discern” or distinguish between “good and evil, truth and falsehood;” they could readily perceive the nature and tendency of the things proposed to them, and the comparative excellency or worthlessness of them: even as natural men, by a sound judgment and long continued habits, decide at once upon natural things, with great accuracy; or as the bodily senses at once distinguish and judge of their proper objects. (Notes, Job 12:11,12. 34:1—4. Cant. 1:3. Matt. 6:22,23. 1 Cor. 2:14—16.)

Fallen men cannot approach God, except on “a mercy seat,” through a high priest, and by a sacrifice for sin: but “a priest, who was compassed with infirmity,” and needed to offer sacrifice for himself, however he might compassionate the ignorant and transgressors, could never be an effectual advocate with God for them. Indeed, in the more ordinary work of the ministry, the consciousness of our own sinfulness and unworthiness is well suited to render us tender to the weak, the erroneous, the tempted, and the fallen; “seeing we ourselves are compassed with infirmity;” and, though this service differs widely from that of the priests under the Law, yet no man should take it upon him, till it appear to other competent persons, as well as himself, that “he is called of God” to it.—But Christ alone is qualified and authorized to be our High Priest; his dignity and excellency, as the Son of God, and his appointment by the Father to that office, give efficacy to his ministrations: his voluntary humiliation and sufferings, “in the days of his flesh, when he offered up prayers and supplications” to the Father, “with strong crying and tears,” assure us of his tender love and compassion to his afflicted people; and the answer given to his earnest prayers makes way for the granting of our weak and defiled petitions, when offered in his name. His obedience in our nature encourages our attempts to obey, and our expectations of support and comfort, under all the temptations and sufferings to which we are exposed: for “being made perfect” for this great work, “he is become the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him.” But are we of that number? we at present, whatever our former conduct has been, obediently receive his instructions as our Prophet, trust in his sacrifice and intercession as our Priest, and make his commandments the rule of our conduct, as the subjects of his kingdom? To those who thus come to him, and yield themselves to him, and to those alone, he will be "the Author of eternal salvation." Of this great High Priest, and of his merits, grace, and authority, ministers have many things to say, which they will not be able to utter in a proper manner, unless "he give them a mouth and wisdom" for that purpose; and men's prejudices are so many and so strong, that they are generally more ready to take offence, than to receive instruction. Nor are professed Christians, even old professors of evangelical doctrine, so docile as might be expected: many are far from that spiritual maturity, which is proportioned to the time, during which they have attended to the gospel. Instead of teaching others, they need to be taught themselves "the first principles of the oracles of God;" they "need milk, and not strong meat;" they are babes in understanding, but not in teachableness; they are "unskilful in the word of righteousness," yet they often presume to dictate to their pastors! These things are very discouraging: but we should still exercise patience and meekness, and "seek out acceptable words," in which to convey instructions in the best manner we can. Aged professors of the gospel, as well as babes in Christ, should beware of prejudice, and pray for a mind open to conviction.—We ought indeed to begin with simpler truths, and so gradually proceed to such as are more deep and perplexing: and to employ ourselves peculiarly about first principles, by an experimental and practical improvement of the truth: thus we shall gradually be matured in judgment, and enabled to digest strong meat: and our spiritual senses will be habituated to a just and exact discernment of good and evil; which will greatly tend to our stability, comfort, and fruitfulness in the faith of Christ. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11.)

CHAP. VI.

The apostle purposes to lead the Hebrews forward in the knowledge of Christ, 1—3. He shows the desperate state of apostates, 4—6; and illustrates it by a simile of barren land, which no culture improves, 7, 8; but declares his favorable opinion of the Hebrew Christians, and his desire of their fruitfulness and diligence, in order to their assured hope to the end, 9—12. He expatiates on the security of the covenant of grace, as confirmed to Abraham by the promise and oath of God, for the strong consolation of all future believers, 12—20.

Note.—The apostle here proposed, to lead the Hebrews into a fuller acquaintance with the deep mysteries of redemption of which he had spoken, and thus to "go on unto perfection." (Note, 5:11—14.) In order to this, he would leave "the principles" or elements "of the doctrine of Christ." Without specially insisting on these things; he implicitly requested their attentive and candid perusal of his arguments on other subjects, suited to improvement of such as were no longer babes in Christ. (Notes, Eph. 4:14—16.) The necessity of "repentance from dead works," such as are done by men dead in sin, and which expose them to the condemnation of eternal death, was indeed fundamental to true Christianity: but they had been instructed in it from the first dawning of the new dispensation. (Notes, Matt. 3:2,7—10. 9:10—13.) Nor would he speak particularly of the nature and necessity of faith towards God, or a belief of his testimony, and a dependence on his mercy, grace, and faithful promises in Jesus Christ. (Notes, John 3:14—21,27—36. 5:24—27,39—44.) He did not indeed purpose to discourse concerning "the doctrine of baptisms;" either the various legal washings, whether by immersion, ablution, or sprinkling; or John's baptism, and that of Christ, which were distinct from each other, or concerning the traditional baptisms of the Pharisees. (Notes, 9:8—10. Matt. 3:5,6. 15:1,2. Mark 7:3,4. John 3:22—26.) Neither would he treat of "the laying on of" the apostles' "hands," by which miraculous powers were conferred, as evidential of the truth of the gospel; or "the laying on of hands" in the ordination of ministers, as a significant token of the authority intrusted to them. (Notes, Acts 6:2—6. 8:14—24. 19:1—6.) Nor would he insist upon the important doctrine of "the resurrection of the dead," or that of "eternal judgment," the consequences of which will be eternal happiness or eternal misery. But, passing over these subjects for the present, he meant to explain to them the deeper and more spiritual mysteries of redemption by Christ; and he would proceed to execute his design, in the subsequent part of the epistle, if the Lord would permit him.—Some expositors explain these "principles of the doctrine of Christ," as relating wholly to instructions contained in the Old Testament, concerning the Messiah's kingdom; and some confine them exclusively to the new dispensation. Others, favoring the former scheme, interpret "the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands," to signify the legal purifications, and the laying on of the hands of the offerer upon the head of the sacrifice, as typical of repentance and faith; including the words in a parenthesis. But, understanding by "principles," not the most fundamental truths, or parts of Christianity; but the introductory elements, the lower and easier beginnings of it, as letters are the first principles, or elements, or beginning (αρχή) of learning; we may see a propriety in the interpretation above given. Some of the things mentioned were, though most important in themselves, yet the more obvious and simple parts of Christianity; and the others were externals connected with the first profession of it, on which the Jews were apt to lay far more stress, than they ought to have done: and it was obvious for the apostle to mention these, when he would call them off from the introductory elements of Christianity, to its more sublime and spiritual doctrines.

The punishment of the damned, says Justin Martyr, is endless punishment, and torment in eternal fire. Irenæus, in his symbol of faith, makes this one article, That Christ would send the ungodly and unjust into everlasting fire.—Tertullian declares, that all wicked men are appointed to eternal torments: and if any man, says he, thinks the wicked are to be consumed, and not punished, let him remember, that hell-fire is styled eternal, because designed for eternal punishment; and their substance will remain for ever, whose punishment doth so. St. Cyprian saith, that the souls of the wicked are kept, with their bodies, to be grieved with endless torments. There is no measure nor end of their torments, saith Minutius. Lastly, Origen reckons this among the doctrines defined by the church; That every soul, when it goes out of this world, shall either enjoy the inheritance of eternal life and bliss, if its deeds have rendered it fit for life; or is to be delivered up to eternal fire and punishment, if its sins have deserved that state.' Whitby.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It was the more proper to write, in the manner proposed, to the Hebrews; as those who adhered to Christianity had been sufficiently for a long time instructed in the introductory lessons; and those who had renounced it were in a most hopeless condition.—These verses have caused immense perplexity and distress to many timid and conscientious Christians; and they have been supposed to contain a cogent objection to the doctrine of the believer's final perseverance. These things must be in a measure adverted to, in our examination of them. It should be remembered, that the apostle wrote in an age of miracles; and to the Hebrews, among whom the Holy Spirit was first poured out, in his extraordinary operations, as well as his renewing influences. (Notes, Acts 2:37-40. 5:32. 6:8. 8:14-17. 10:44-48. 19:1-4.) The persons whose case is described, had been "once enlightened," and had obtained that measure of knowledge concerning the truth and nature of Christianity, which enabled them to make a satisfactory profession of it, in order to their admission into the church; "they had tasted the heavenly gift, and been made partakers of the Holy Ghost;" being at their baptism, or afterwards, by the laying on of the apostles' hands, endued with some measure of spiritual gifts, or miraculous powers; such as speaking with tongues, or discoursing with supernatural fluency on divine subjects: so that, in this respect, "they had tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Spirit," and their own experience proved to them the truth of the gospel. They had moreover "tasted of the good word of God," and their convictions, impressions, and affections, made them sensible that it was a "good word," of a holy and salutary tendency, and that it was for their good to attend to it; and their purposes of doing so had produced such hopes and joys, as have been described in the case of the stony-ground hearer. (Note, Matt. 13:20-22. Mark 6:15-29.) Thus they had tasted of "the powers of the world to come," in their temporary realizing apprehensions of a future state, and of its happiness or misery: or, they had experienced the powers communicated, under the dispensation of the Messiah. All these things, except miraculous gifts, often take place in the hearts and consciences of men, in these days, who yet continue unregenerate. They have knowledge, convictions, fears, hopes, joys, and seasons of apparent earnestness, and deep concern about eternal things; and they are endued with such gifts as often make them acceptable and useful to others: but they are not truly humbled; they are not spiritually minded; religion is not their element and delight; they do not cordially receive Christ in all his offices, or sincerely love the spiritual excellency of his people, his ordinances, and commandments. In short, the old nature, the principle of selfishness, is impressed, affected, interested, alarmed, or pleased: but a new nature is not produced; and therefore "in time of temptation they fall away."—In respect of spiritual gifts, or the miraculous "powers of the Holy Ghost," our Lord most expressly declares, that he will reject many who had been partakers of them, saying to them, "I never knew you." (Notes, Matt. 7:21-23. 1 Cor. 13:1-3.)—Yet those who received gifts of this kind from Christ, through the laying on of the hands of his apostles, had a personal demonstration of the truth of Christianity, which the most enlightened apostates in these days can scarcely be supposed to have had: and therefore but few instances now occur, in which a conclusion concerning their state can be unreservedly drawn in the apostle's awful words; though the case of some may be nearly similar, and they alone are immediately concerned in them. (Notes, 10:26, 27. 2 Tim. 4:14,15. 1 John 5:16-18.) If the persons, whom the apostle had thus characterized, (for he spake of none else,) had totally apostatized from Christianity, and were become their avowed enemies, it was not the minister's duty to bestow pains about them; it was found "impossible to renew them to repentance," and thus to "restore them in the spirit of meekness." For, considering the clear light against which they sinned in so desperate a manner, it might be concluded, that they had committed "the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit," and had ascribed his operations, and the miracles wrought, by themselves and by others, as well as the holy joys and experience of true believers, to a satanical influence. (Note, Matt. 12:31,32.) In fact, as far as they could, "they crucified to themselves the Son of God afresh:" despitefully showing that they approved the conduct of those who nailed him to the cross; they assented to their deed; and apparently wished it in their power to repeat his ignominy and torture; and they "put him to an open shame," by renouncing his religion, blaspheming his name, joining his enemies, and doing evil to his disciples. They were, therefore, to be considered, as given up to final obduracy, and left to the awful judgment of God.—This conclusion, however, by no means authorized ministers finally to exclude from the communion of the church, those apostates, who professed repentance, and appeared to be true penitents; much less did it warrant such rigor in less aggravated cases. In general, encouragement should be held forth to all, who appear penitent; nay, to induce the most obdurate to repentance: and means are in most cases to be used for the recovery of such as have most lamentably turned aside; though ill success will often discourage the benevolent endeavor. The very words, however, of this awful passage prove, that all who "are renewed unto repentance" shall be pardoned; and that God leaves all to final impenitence, whom he determines not to save. (Note, Tim. 2:23-26.) So that the trembling sinner, who pleads guilty, and cries for mercy, can have no ground for discouragement from this passage, fairly interpreted, whatever his crimes have been: for all who are "renewed to repentance" are saved, and none else. Neither does it prove that any one, who is "in Christ a new creature," ever becomes a final apostate from him. (Note, 9:10.) —Impossible. (4) If God "swear in his wrath that any man shall not enter into his rest," (Notes, 3:17-19.) he is so given up to hardness of heart, that his case resembles that of fallen angels, or the damned: and the same impossibility of repentance takes place as exists in respect of them.

Note.—The different sorts of professed Christians might be compared to fruitful and barren land. (Notes, Matt. 13:3-8,18-23.) The believer resembled a field, which, being well watered by the rain from heaven, yielded a valuable produce to repay the husbandman's toil; the fertile appearance and useful fruits of which, showed, that it had "received a blessing from God." Thus, the true Christian, by divine grace, being enabled to improve ordinances and advantages, so as to become fruitful in genuine good works, honorable to the Lord, and profitable to men, was blessed, and would be still more so. But, as the sterile soil, which neither by the rain nor the husbandman's labor could be made to produce any thing better than thorns and briers, was generally left as a neglected desert, under the original curse, being fit for nothing with all its produce but to be burned; so the mere nominal Christian, continuing unfruitful under the means of grace, or producing nothing but hypocrisy, selfishness, and iniquity, was likely to be left under the curse of the law; was near to the awful state above described; and everlasting misery in the flames of hell was the end reserved for him, if he continued in his present unfruitfulness.—This was a solemn warning to professed Christians to beware, that they were not left to apostatize, as the punishment of their unfruitfulness. ter things of you, and <sup>c</sup> things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak.

10 For <sup>d</sup> God is not unrighteous <sup>e</sup> to forget your <sup>f</sup> work and labor of love, <sup>g</sup> which ye have showed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.

Note.—While the apostle spoke such awful and alarming truths, with reference to the case of those, to whom he knew them to be seasonable; he would not have it thought, that he had an unfavorable opinion of the Hebrew Christians in general, or of those whom he immediately addressed in particular. On the contrary, he and his fellow laborers, were “persuaded better things of them, even things which accompany salvation;” namely, that they were real penitents, humble believers, spiritually minded, and rooted and grounded in the love of Christ, and of his cause and people. The expression is remarkable and emphatical: the things before spoken of (Note, 4—6.) might, or they might not, “accompany,” or be inseparably connected with “salvation;” but those things of which he now spake, were always found in true converts, and never in any others.—“Nothing availeth in Christ ... but faith which worketh by love”—“but a new creation.” “Hereby we know, that we are passed from death unto life; because we love the brethren.”—“To be spiritually minded is life and peace.” (Notes, Matt. 5:3—12. Rom. 8:5—9. 2 Cor. 5:17. Gal. 5:1—6. 6:15,16. Eph. 2:4—10. 1 John 3:13—15.) There is no intimation in the whole Bible, that any one, who ever had these things, came short of eternal salvation; or that any apostate ever possessed them.—The apostle especially referred in this, to those Jewish converts, who had manifested their love to the name of God, as revealed in Christ, by their works, yea, their laborious services, and “in ministering to the saints” for his sake. (Notes, 10:32—34. 1 Thes. 1:1—4.) Of this, a most admirable specimen had been given, after the day of Pentecost; and many of them still continued the same disinterested, self-denying conduct. (Notes, Acts 2:44—47. 4:32—35.) These genuine evidences of “faith working by love,” God would not reject or forget: “he was not unrighteous;” and therefore he would not fail to deal with them, according to his promises and covenant-engagements to believers, who have, “through grace,” a claim upon him on that ground. 11 And <sup>h</sup> we desire that every one of

Note.—The apostle and his brethren earnestly desired and longed, that every one of those whom he addressed might thenceforth show the same attentive and disinterested “diligence” in good works, which some had heretofore shown: that so, evidencing his faith to be genuine, beyond all reason for doubt or hesitation, he might obtain and possess the “full assurance of hope,” in respect of his final salvation, to comfort him under all trials, even to the end of life. Thus the whole company would be distinguished from “slothful,” unfruitful professors of Christianity; and be approved as “imitators” of their pious progenitors; and of those Christians, who by faith in the promises of God, and “patient continuance in well-doing,” and in waiting his time of deliverance from trials, had at length entered into rest, and were actually enjoying that perfect felicity, in which all the promises of God to his people centered. (Note, 10:35—39.)—This is a conclusive proof of the immediate happiness of believers after death; if the above be the true interpretation: and, after having maturely considered the other interpretations of the passage, which some learned men have given; the author hesitates not to say, that he considers them as absurd, and has no doubt the apostle meant to lead his readers to meditate on the happiness of Abraham, Moses, Joshua, and Job, and all others, who had on earth lived by faith in the promises of God, especially the great promise of a Saviour, and eternal salvation by him; had patiently waited, labored, and suffered, in the obedience of faith; and in consequence were, at the time when the apostle wrote this, inheriting the promises of God, of eternal blessings through Christ to all believers.—“Assurance of hope” (11) should be distinguished from “the assurance of understanding,” (Note, Col. 2:1—4.) and from “the assurance of faith.” (Note, 10:19—22.) He who so understands the gospel, as to perceive the relation of each part to all the rest, and its use as a part of one grand design; in something of the same manner, that a skillful anatomist understands the use and office of every part of the human body, in relation to the whole; has “the full assurance of understanding;” and those things which appear inconsistent, useless, or superfluous to others, he perceives essentially necessary to the system, or great design. The man, who is fully convinced, that this consistent and harmonious, though complicated design, is the work and revelation of God; and has no doubt the things testified are true, that the promises and threatenings will be fulfilled, and that Christ will certainly save all true believers, has "the full assurance of faith:" though he may, through misapprehension, or temptation, or other causes, doubt of his own personal interest in this salvation. But he, who beyond doubt or hesitation is assured, that he himself is a true believer, interested in all the precious promises, sealed by the sanctifying Spirit, and "a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed;" has "the full assurance of hope."—"The full assurance of faith," is the duty of every one: for he who doubts the truth of the testimony, or the faithfulness of the promises of God, questions his veracity: (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.) but "the full assurance of hope," must be obtained and preserved by diligence; and, though the want of it may generally be traced to a criminal source, it is not the proximate duty of every one, in fact of a very few. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:13—16. 2 Pet. 1:10,11.) A man may question, whether the paper in his possession be a genuine bank-bill, or a counterfeit; and yet have no doubt, either of the ability or willingness of the Directors of the Bank, to honor every genuine bank-bill.—"The full assurance of hope," in the highest meaning of the words, is attained by comparatively few; and is seldom if ever preserved, without some degree of diminution or variation, through the remainder of life: but a prevailing assurance of acceptance, and of final salvation, is the privilege of all diligent and consistent Christians; and is, in them, seldom greatly interrupted, except by misapprehension, or by peculiar temptations and conflicts, or by their being betrayed into sin.

13 For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, <sup>a</sup> he sware by himself,

Note.—There could be no reason to doubt of the Lord's performing his promises to those, who trusted him, and waited for him: for the covenant, ratified with Abraham, in some respects typified, and in others was substantially the same with that made with every believer: (Notes, Ex. 19:1. Rom. 4:9—25. Gal. 3:6—29.) and when God gave the promises to "the Father of the faithful," he at length was pleased to confirm them with an oath, showing his irrevocable purpose of accomplishing them; and, "because he could swear by no greater, he swear by himself;" and so pledged the honor of his great name and all his perfections, as the security of that engagement. (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. 15:5—21. 17:1—19. 22:16—18.) Accordingly, Abraham "patiently waited" the Lord's time; and the promised blessings to him and his seed were at length vouchsafed. When old and full of days he died, and was personally blessed in God, as his "exceeding great Reward;" his posterity also increased; the promises made to them were accomplished; the Messiah at length came, and all the nations of the earth were now about to be blessed in him.—The quotation is not made exactly from the Septuagint, nor does it entirely accord with the Hebrew; (Gen. 22:16,17.) but it gives the general meaning, in words suited to the occasion.

Note.—It is customary for men to swear by those, who are greater than themselves, or whom they suppose to be so; and they call on them to witness their attestations or engagements, and to avenge their unfaithfulness if they fail of them. When important concerns require it, and the omniscient God is thus reverently and uprightly appealed to, it should be considered as an act of worship to him: and an oath, for the confirmation of covenants and treaties, is the means of terminating disputes of every kind, by establishing mutual confidence between the parties; from the persuasion, that men in general will not defy the vengeance of heaven by deliberate perjury. The Lord, therefore, in condescension to the weakness of man, and his proneness to unbelief; and purposing to give his people to the most abundant assurance, "that" his counsel "respecting their salvation was immutable;" confirmed the promise and covenant respecting it, with the most solemn ratification of an oath. That so, "by two immutable things," even the Word and the Oath, (or, as others understand it, 'by the immutable counsel, and inviolable oath') "in which it was impossible for God to lie," either by being deceived, or induced to deceive others, or by seeing cause to alter his purposes; they all, (in the apostle's time, and consequently in all times,) "who had fled for refuge" from the wrath to come, "to lay hold on the hope" of pardon and eternal life set before them in the gospel, might have a firm ground for assured hope, and the "powerful consolations" which spring from it. These persons, to whatever nation they belonged, were the "heirs of promise," the spiritual "children of Abraham," and interested in the covenant ratified to him and to his seed: (Note, 13—15. 11:8—10.) and therefore "the oath sworn to Abraham" irrevocably confirmed the spiritual blessings of that covenant to each of them. (Note, Luke 1:67—79.)—In order to ascertain that they were of this number; it was needful to inquire, whether they, having discovered their danger of falling under the curse of the broken law, and under the wrath of God, had renounced all other confidences, and broken through all hindrances, to "flee for refuge," (as the manslayer speeded towards the appointed city, Note, Num. 35:11—15.) to the rich mercy of God, through the redemption of Christ, according to the covenant of grace; laying hold on this Object of a sinner's hope, which God himself has placed before us for that purpose, by a humble persevering reliance on his promises through Jesus Christ, manifested by its genuine effects. (Notes, Rom. 3:19—26.) Those who had thus "fled for refuge, to lay hold on the hope set before them," had a "strong consolation" given them in the oath and covenant of God. (Note, 2 Thes. 3:16, 17.) In fact their consciences unworthiness, depravity, and weakness; their experience of the deceitfulness of their hearts; their conflicts with inward and outward enemies; and the various temptations, trials, and persecutions, to which their profession would expose them, rendered such security, consolation, and hope in God needful to them, even as the anchor is to the ship. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:24—27. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. 1 John 3:1—3.) By this hope, as by an anchor, they would be preserved in their proper station, without being driven from their profession or duty by any storms; while others would be induced to apostacy, by worldly fears or hopes, or be drawn aside by manifold delusions: even as the ships, which have no anchor, will be driven by the tempest from their station on the rocks or sands, forced out to sea, or dashed in pieces one against another.—No anchors, however, can at all times secure the ship from driving, or being wrecked: but this hope in the divine promise, oath, and covenant, was so "sure" in itself, and kept the possessor so "steadfast" in his adherence to the truth and cause of God, that it always secured him from final ruin; and, in proportion to its vigorous exercise, from temporary failures also, and against the storms of incumbent temptations. For, it "entered into that within the veil," and fixed the heart in a stable union with those things, which are in the true Holy of Holies, in heaven itself; and in joyful expectation of them; and caused the believer to stay himself on the power, truth, and love of God to sinners in Christ Jesus, to bring him to the enjoyment of that felicity. For thither its great object, Jesus the divine Saviour, had already entered, and continually ministered in the Father's presence, for the benefit of all believers: being their Forerunner and Representative, who, as their High Priest, had on earth atoned for their sins by the sacrifice of himself; and who, being risen from the dead, was gone before them to heaven, to prepare a place for them, to remove all obstacles to their admission, to take possession in their stead, and to reign and plead in their behalf; being constituted "a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek," of which order the apostle was about to discourse more fully. #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The first principles and "rudiments of the doctrine of Christ" should be accurately understood, before men attempt to learn the sublimer mysteries of the gospel: yet they must not always be confined to them, but should be "led on towards perfection," both in knowledge, experience, and holiness.—Even the fundamentals of "repentance from dead works, faith towards God, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment" should not engross men's whole attention: but every part of the truth and will of God should, in due order and proportion, be set before all who profess the gospel, and enforced on their hearts and consciences. Much less then should we perpetually be discoursing or disputing about "baptisms, and laying on of hands," and other externals; which have their place and use, but often occupy far too much of the attention and time of those, who might be more profitably employed.—We cannot but lament to see those, who once made a credible profession of the gospel, turn back into the world and sin, and thus in a measure "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame;" as if, upon trial, they found nothing in his salvation worthy of their constant regard! In general we should warn and pray for such persons; but there are cases, in which we must let them alone, as having no prospect of their being "renewed to repentance." We should beware, and we ought to caution others, of every approach to so tremendous a precipice: yet in doing this, we should keep close to the word of God, and be careful not to wound and terrify the weak, or discourage the fallen and penitent.—Knowledge, gifts, convictions, and very strong impressions, must precede; or an apostacy of this kind cannot take place: great obstinacy and malignity must follow, before we are warranted to conclude it fatal or final. The general invitations and promises of the gospel include all, who are humbly willing to embrace them; humiliation and self-condemnation, when united with some hope and cries for mercy, are such tokens of God's "renewing a man to repentance," as should be pointed out to him, for his encouragement in expecting forgiveness. On the other hand, the self-confident should be taught, that knowledge, gifts, terrors, subsequent joys, and high affections, are no certain evidence of a man's conversion; without brokenness of heart, hatred of sin, a spiritual mind, and "faith which worketh by love." But those whom it is indeed "impossible to renew unto repentance," are commonly the last to think themselves in so awful a state: and such as are most harassed by fears of this kind, may generally be assured that this is not their case, whatever they have been, or done: unless they actually run into ungodliness and wickedness, through total desperation.

V. 7—12.

A negligent and unfruitful profession of the gospel tends directly to the brink of that dreadful precipice above described: for when abundant means of grace, and even the ordinary strivings of the convincing Spirit of God, leave men unchanged, and produce not those fruits of holiness, which prove that they have received blessings from God, and are blessed of him; they are often given up, like waste land, to bear briars and thorns only: their state is nigh unto cursing; and the end of all unfruitful profession will be "the furnace of fire, where is wailing and gnashing of teeth."—Let us then fear with humble caution and watchful prayer, in respect of ourselves; and let us hope the best of others, that the case will admit of. Whilst we warn such as are in evident danger, we should encourage those, in whom we judge that the "things which accompany salvation" are found. Ministers should frequently specify these, in an experimental and distinguishing manner: and, in respect of them, all should examine themselves, frequently and seriously; instead of perplexing themselves about those texts which were inserted to serve as beacons to warn the presumptuous against fatal rocks, and not to fright the humble and cautious. Of those "things which accompany salvation," none is more free from ambiguity, than laborious self-denying love to the name of the Lord, shown by "ministering" with persevering affection "to his saints;" and, though God is no man's debtor, and will reward no works which proceed from pride and self-righteousness, however splendid and laborious they are; yet "he is not unrighteous:" nor will he forget one service, which springs from humble, grateful love. He has spoken, and he will be as good as his word, that "not a cup of cold water, given to a disciple" from regard to his Lord, "shall in any wise lose its reward." (Notes, Matt. 10: 40—42. 25:34—40.) We should therefore earnestly desire, that we, and all who are called Christians, may "give the same diligence" in such good works, as the most eminent saints in the primitive ages did. This is the scriptural way of acquiring and preserving "the full assurance of hope," to the end of our lives. Many have thus "by faith and patience inherited the promises;" but no slothful professor of Christianity has any evidence that he is following them to heaven.

The privileges of the gospel belong to the diligent and fruitful, who walk in the steps of Abraham, to whom the promises were made. These obtain an inward testimony, by the powerful operation of the Holy Spirit; and give abundant proof in their lives, that they are "the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise." This inward seal confirms to them personally that covenant, which God has ratified "with an oath to the heirs of promise" in general. Because their infirmities are many, and their trials great, their condescending and compassionate Father is "willing more abundantly to show them the immutability of his counsel;" that, by his faithful word and irrevocable oath, "they might have a strong consolation, having fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them." Indeed the Lord, having "sworn by himself, that he hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but that he should repent and live," holds out abundant encouragement to all, whom he "warns to flee from the wrath to come," and invites to "lay hold for refuge on the hope set before them." And, as he "cannot lie," the destruction of the unbeliever, and the salvation of the believer, are alike certain. Let then such as have fled to Christ, and have their hope sealed to them, "by the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Spirit," rely confidently on the power, truth, mercy, and covenant of God, amidst the opposition of earth and hell. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:15—17, 28—39.) Let them pray for faith and hope equal to their security: thus let them "cast anchor within the veil," staying their souls on the word of God, and on the mediation of their great High Priest, in all dangers, afflictions, and temptations: let them follow the steps, as well as trust in the merits, of the great Forerunner of his people. Let them by faith realize his appearance before the Father's throne for them, as their constituted High Priest and King: for, while those who go before on earth, to prepare the way and make all ready for others, are commonly in many respects greatly their inferiors; our "Forerunner" is the "Lord of hosts, the King of glory," "God manifested in the flesh." (Notes, Ps. 24:7—10. Luke 1:11—17, 76—79. Eph. 1:15, 23. 4:7—10. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Let us, therefore, "set our affections on things above," and wait patiently for his appearance, when we also shall most certainly "appear with him in glory." (Note, Col. 3:1—4.)

CHAP. VII.

The superiority of Melchisedek's typical priesthood, above that of Aaron, proved and illustrated, 1—10. It was intended, that the priesthood should be changed, and consequently that the ritual law of Moses should be disannulled, when the Messiah came; that a better covenant and priesthood might take place, 11—12. This was needful, for the more perfect state of the church, and for the salvation of all who come to God by Jesus Christ, to the uttermost, and for ever, 13—23.

who met Abraham returning from <sup>d</sup> the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him;

Note.—The apostle had repeatedly referred to the prophecy, that the Messiah should be “a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedek,” signifying that his priesthood would resemble that of Melchisedek, and not that of Aaron. (6:20. Notes, 5:5—10. Ps. 110:4.) He therefore next proceeded to illustrate that prophecy, and argue more explicitly from it, as compared with the scriptural account of this extraordinary person. (Note, Gen. 14:18—20.) “Melchisedek king of Salem,” which probably means Jerusalem, and “priest of the most high God,” by an appointment of which we have no information; “met Abraham,” after he had vanquished the invading kings, who had carried Lot captive from Sodom: and, as “priest of the most high God,” “he blessed” Abraham, and received of him “a tenth part of” the spoils taken from his conquered enemies. His very name, being by interpretation, “king of righteousness,” and doubtless corresponding with his character and administration, marked him out as a type of the Messiah and of his kingdom. (Note, 1:8,9.) The name of his city signified Peace, and, as “king of peace,” he typified Christ, “the Prince of Peace,” the great Reconciler of God and man, and of men to one another, in perfect consistency with the interests of righteousness, and the honor of the divine law and justice. (Notes, Eph. 2:11—18. Col. 1:18—23.) And the union in Melchisedek of royal authority with the priestly office, (which were divided between the family of Aaron and that of David, in the case of Israel,) plainly pointed to the Messiah, as “a Priest upon his throne.” (Note, Zech. 6:12,13.)—No account is given of Melchisedek’s parentage, or pedigree, as in the case of the priests appointed by the law; who were all required to prove their descent from Aaron, and exact rules were given concerning their marriages, for this, as well as for other reasons. But it is not so much as known from which of Noah’s sons Melchisedek descended: for he is introduced into the sacred history, as a “priest of the most high God,” who had no father, or mother, or genealogy; that he might the more exactly typify that High Priest, who, as “the Son of man,” had no human Father, as “the Son of God” was without mother, and who was appointed to the priesthood without deducing his pedigree from Aaron, or any other predecessor. Moreover, nothing was recorded of Melchisedek respecting the “beginning of his life, or the end of his days,” and priesthood; that he might typically resemble “the Son of God,” whose existence is from eternity to eternity; and who has had no predecessor, and will have no successor, in his efficacious, meritorious, and perpetual Priesthood. In all these respects the silence of the scripture, being intentional, and referring to the great Antitype, is mentioned in language taken from the instruction to be conveyed, rather than from historical fact; of which learned men have brought instances from other writers of antiquity.

Slaughter. (1) Κοιτης. Here only N. T. Gen. 14:17. Sept. From κοιτω, to smite. “He smote them:” it is not certain that he slew them. (Note, Gen. 14:14—16.)—Without descent. (3) Αγενεολογητος. Without genealogy. Not elsewhere. No genealogy is given of Melchisedek: and those of Christ lead back, not to Aaron, but to David and Judah. (6,14.)—Made like. Αφομοιωμενος. Here only. Ομοιωσ, 2:17.—The composition is probably intended to add energy: Made very like.—Continually. Εις το διηνεκες. 10:1,12,14.

5 And verily, they that are of the sons of Levi, <sup>l</sup> who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment <sup>m</sup> to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they <sup>n</sup> come out of the loins of Abraham:

9 And, as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, <sup>v</sup> payed tithes in Abraham:

10 For he was yet <sup>x</sup> in the loins of his father, when Melchisedek met him.

Note.—The argument, arising from the fact, that one of Abraham’s contemporaries was in some things superior to him, as here stated, served to introduce with great advantage a most conclusive argument against the perpetual obligation of the Levitical law, and the continuance of the Aaronic priesthood, and that of the covenant made with the nation of Israel at:

Sinai. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) The apostle, therefore, exhorted the Hebrews to "consider how great" a person their inspired law-giver had represented Melchisedek to be, not so much in respect of his regal authority, as of his priesthood; when even "the patriarch Abraham," the honored father of their whole nation, who was not one of Melchisedek's subjects, or in any other way connected with him, owned his superiority, and paid him tithes, as the representative "of the most high God." The Levites indeed were ordered in the law, as the Lord's tribe, "to take tithes of their brethren" the descendants of Abraham, of which the priests had a tenth part for their portion: (Notes, Lev. 27:30—33. Num. 18:21—32.) but Melchisedek, who was not of Abraham's family, received tithes of that patriarch himself. Nay, as "the priest of the most high God," he pronounced a solemn benediction upon him, to whom the promises, concerning the Messiah, and "all nations being blessed in him," were made. Now it was well known, and certain beyond "all contradiction," that the inferior character was to be blessed, in this authoritative manner, by the superior and more honorable; as children by their parents, and the people by the priests. (Marg. Ref. r. —Notes, 11:20,21. Num. 6:24—27.) So that, some One higher than Abraham, or Aaron, or any mere man of his race, was evidently to be expected, as "a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedek." Under the law indeed, mere sinful dying men took tithes of their brethren; and so one generation after another rose up to receive them: but in the case of Melchisedek, one, concerning whom it was only "witnessed that he liveth," (that is, nothing is said either of his birth or his death,) received tithes of Abraham, as the representative of his posterity; by which it was intimated that a Priest should arise, to whom the whole Israel of God would pay their devoted homage, and from whom they would receive the blessing. So that, "to speak it in a word," the apostle might say, that even Levi, and all the priests descended from him, paid tithes to Melchisedek; "for they were in the loins of their father" and representative, "when Melchisedek met him." This incontestably proved the inferiority of the Levitical priesthood to that of the Messiah; yea, its absolute dependence on him, and subserviency to him.—Indeed, it may be said, that CHRIST also "was in the loins of Abraham;" but his divine nature, his miraculous and immaculate conception, and his being the intended and predicted Antitype, sufficiently show that he was excepted, as the Seed to whom especially the promises were made.—This argument of the apostle illustrates the nature of our union with Adam, and representation by him, and our participation of the consequences of his apostacy; as well as the method of our recovery by "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven." (Notes, Gen. 2:16,17. 3:17—19. Rom. 5:12—19.)

there that <sup>a</sup> another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedek, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity <sup>b</sup> a change also of the law.

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that <sup>f</sup> after the similitude of Melchisedek there ariseth another priest,

Note.—If God had designed, that the most perfect state of the church on earth, should be "by the Levitical priesthood;" and if complete salvation could have been obtained by that institution, without reference to the priesthood of the Messiah; "what occasion was there for another Priest to arise," and of another order? Or why should the Holy Spirit dictate such a prediction as that above quoted, and raise such an expectation as it was suited to excite? The ten commandments indeed, and many other parts of the law, were given before Aaron was expressly appointed to the priesthood, or mentioned as the intended high priest, and progenitor of the sacerdotal race: but the Aaronic priesthood was introduced before the legal dispensation received its final confirmation: and the appointment of that priesthood constituted an essential part of it; being so inseparably connected with all its ministrations, that scarcely any part of it could be exactly performed without them. Thus the people "received the law," along with the Aaronic priesthood; and the termination of that priesthood must render the observance of the law impracticable, by necessary consequence. "The change of the priesthood" must imply "a change also of the law;" and the introduction of "a Priest after the order of Melchisedek," must abrogate the ceremonial law, and terminate the legal dispensation. For it had been expressly and repeatedly predicted, that the Messiah should arise from another tribe, even that of Judah; (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Gen. 49:10. Is. 9:6,7. 11:1. Matt. 22:41—46.) and though most of their kings had been of that tribe, yet none of them had ever presumed to officiate at the altar, except Uzziah, who was severely rebuked for his temerity. (Note, 2 Chr. 26:16—23.) The kingdom and the priesthood were thus kept entirely distinct, under the law; while their union in the Person of the Messiah, of the tribe of Judah, was also predicted in the most explicit manner. 27. Zech. 6:12,13.) Indeed, it was evident, and sufficiently proved, that "our Lord" and Saviour, to whom the apostle called his brethren's attention, was descended from Judah, and of the family of David; (Notes, Matt. 1:1—17. Luke 3:23—38.) of which Moses in the law had said nothing concerning their admission to the priesthood: so that the prediction and its accomplishment concurred in proving, that the Aaronic priesthood and the Mosaic law were abrogated by the coming and Priesthood of the Messiah, and were of no further validity or efficacy.—The prophecy of him, as "a Priest after the order of Melchisedek," made this evident even to a demonstration, yea, more evident than any other argument could do: for this Priest was not constituted after, or according to, the ritual law of Moses, or any of its prescriptions, which were in themselves a carnal commandment relating to mere externals, and incapable of securing spiritual excellency to the appointed high priests; but he was constituted "according to the power of an endless life." For, though Christ willingly died for the sins of the people, yet that was a part of his priestly office, and he had power to resume his life, and to preserve it for ever; that so he might perpetually execute his office, as the only one to whom it belonged, and who alone was capable of duly performing it, even to the end of the world. 18 For there is verily <sup>i</sup> a disannulling of the commandment going before, for <sup>k</sup> the weakness and unprofitableness thereof.

Note.—The prediction before mentioned, and its accomplishment, implied "a disannulling," or abrogation of the preceding commandment, concerning the priesthood, sacrifices, and purifications. And this was expressly intended by the Lord, because they were in themselves "weak and unprofitable:" for, though they had a temporary and typical use and benefit, in respect of the nation of Israel, till the coming of the Messiah, and to believers as means of faith and grace; (Notes, 8:3—6. 9:8—10. 10:1—4. Deut. 32:4. John 1:17. Gal. 3:23—25. 4:8—11, 21—31.) they had no inherent efficacy to purge the conscience or the affections, and they did not at all profit those who rested in them.—Indeed the ceremonial "law made nothing perfect," either in the state of the church, or the hearts and consciences of the worshippers; but "the introduction of a better hope," even that of acceptance with God, through the sacrifice and intercession of Christ, brought the church to its highest state of liberty, and its worship to the most entire spirituality, of which its condition in this world admits; and provided most effectually for the complete justification, the inward peace, and the sanctification of all believers. For by that "hope," men are allowed to draw near to God, even to his mercy-seat, with humble boldness; and are not wholly excluded, as the Gentiles during the law; or kept at a great distance, as the Israelites themselves were. (Note, Eph. 2:11—22.)—The concluding words may be rendered, "The bringing in of a better hope is that, by which we draw near to God."—The original word signifies more than simply "bringing in;" and implies, that this "better hope" was brought in, even under the old dispensation, by the promises and prophecies of the Messiah, and by the types of the law; though more fully and clearly, when Christ had actually come, and finished his work on earth, and entered into his glory.—"The weakness and unprofitableness of the" ceremonial "law," either to justify or sanctify those who rested in the outward observances of it, and who did not by faith look to the things prefigured by it, was exactly parallel to the Christian sacraments, when the opus operatum, the mere attendance on the 'outward and visible sign,' is depended on, while 'the inward and spiritual 'grace,' the things signified in them, are disregarded. To such persons they are "weak and unprofitable;" but to believers, they are means of grace, and solemn and acceptable acts of spiritual worship. (Notes, Rom. 2:25—29. 3:1, 2.)

20 And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made Priest;

21 (For those priests were made without † an oath; but this with an oath, by him that said unto him, °The Lord <sup>p</sup>sware, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek;)

Note.—The very great superiority of the Priesthood of the Messiah, to that of Aaron, was evident from another circumstance, to be especially noted in the sacred oracles. JENOVAH appointed the Levitical priesthood "without an oath," by which he showed that the appointment was revocable, and that it would not always continue. But, in constituting the Messiah to be High Priest, he most solemnly confirmed the appointment with an oath: thus declaring evidently that it was never to be disannulled. Num. 14:27—30. Ps. 110:4.) In proportion therefore to this immense difference, it was to be concluded, that Jesus was “the Surety of a better covenant,” than that of Aaron.—The word signifies a person who is bound with another for the payment of a debt, or the performance of an engagement. Jesus, “the Surety” of his people, became answerable for their debt of sin, and engaged to satisfy divine justice, and magnify the holy law, as their Representative; (Note, Is. 53:7.) and also to bring them to that repentance, faith, and holiness, which are requisite to their participation of the blessings of his covenant. By entering into this engagement, and fulfilling it in their behalf, he became the Surety of the Father to them, for the performance of all the promises of the covenant; being authorized, and exalted, in human nature, to confer on them all the blessings stipulated in it. The word, rendered testament, is commonly translated covenant; its import has been repeatedly considered, and we shall have occasion shortly to speak of it again. (Notes, 9:15—23. Preface to the New Testament.) The better covenant, of which Jesus is the Surety, is not here contrasted with the covenant of works, by which every transgressor is shut up under the curse; but distinguished from the Sinai-covenant with Israel, and the legal dispensation under which the church had so long continued: for the covenant of works had no connexion with the Aaronic priesthood, or the ceremonial law, which exhibited in shadows the blessings of the covenant of grace. (Notes, 8:7—13.) But “the covenant,” of which Jesus was Surety, was far better than that, of which the high priests of Israel were typical sureties; and brought the church, and every believer, into far clearer light, more perfect liberty, and more abundant privileges than that could do. The temporary legal covenant with Israel must therefore be abrogated; or, being fulfilled, and having answered the purposes for which it was appointed, it must become invalid: as a lease, when the term of it is expired; or a bond, when it is paid and cancelled. (Note, Col. 2:13—15.) This was requisite, in order that the irrevocable priesthood of Christ, and the better covenant ratified to him, might be openly introduced, and established for the benefit of the nations of the earth. 23 And they truly <sup>a</sup> were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death:

24 But this man, because <sup>t</sup> he continu-

Note.—The sacred writer next adduced another proof of the superiority of the Messiah’s priesthood above that of Aaron. In the Aaronic priesthood, there “were many priests;” because, being sinful dying men, they were soon removed from their station, and others succeeded them; and the office passing so frequently from one to another, strongly marked its weakness and inefficacy. But the Person of whom the prophet had spoken, and concerning whom the apostle was discoursing, possessed “an unchangeable priesthood,” which was never to pass out of his own hands, and never would be liable to interruption or cessation. (Marg.—Notes, 1—5. 4:14—16.) For, as his death was the appointed sacrifice for the sins of his people; so heaven was the true sanctuary, in which his subsequent ministrations were to be performed; and there, possessing immortality, he will exercise his priestly office in the most perfect manner, till the consummation of all things. (Notes, 9:24—28.) On which account “he is able,” not only by his omnipotence, but in virtue of his priestly character and sacrifice, to save perfectly, to the end, in all possible emergencies and extremities, from all guilt, pollution, and temptation, in all dangers, and against all enemies, every one, and the whole company of those, through all ages and nations, “who come to God,” as sinners for salvation, “by him,” believing in his name, depending on his atonement and intercession, and asking all blessings for his sake, and as the free gift of God through him. This “he is able” to do, because he is not like a mere man, who undertakes to protect or deliver another, and perhaps dies in the critical season: but he “ever liveth,” and reigns “as a Priest upon his throne,” “to make intercession for those who come to God by him;” to plead his merits and sacrifice in their behalf; to present their persons, services, and prayers for acceptance, through the ransom of his blood; to interpose between them, and every one who would lay any thing to their charge; to protect and deliver them by his almighty power, and to give all things to them from his “unsearchable riches.” (Notes, Ps. 146:3—10. John 14:18—20. Rom. 5:6—10. 8:32—34. Col. 3:4. Rev. 1:12—20.)

28 For <sup>k</sup> the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but <sup>l</sup> the word of the oath, which was since the law, <sup>m</sup> maketh the Son, <sup>n</sup> who is * consecrated for evermore.

Note.—The considerate inquirer into this most interesting subject, would perceive, that "such a High Priest" as had been described exactly suited the case of sinners, who were to be restored to the favor and image of a holy God, in a manner consistent with the glory of his name, and peculiarly suited to display that glory; and that he alone could suit it. Such a "High Priest became us," and was proper for us, as was perfectly "holy" in his nature, wholly devoted to God, and full of mercy to men; "harmless," and spotless in his own obedience, that no charge might be brought against him; "undefiled" in his ministrations; "separate," in disposition and conduct, "from the sinners" in whose behalf he was to interpose; and "made higher than the heavens," and all their glorious inhabitants; that the dignity of his Person, and the pre-eminence of his exaltation, might give efficacy to his ministrations, and manifest the justice and holiness of God in saving sinners for his sake, and through his mediation and sacerdotal ministrations. He must be one, who had no need to offer any sacrifices for himself, or to offer repeatedly in behalf of others; as the Levitical priests, who were the coadjutors of the high priest, did daily; and the high priest did on every return of the great day of expiation. (Notes, Lev. 4:3—12. 9:8—11. 16:6, 11—14. Num. 28:2—10.) But such a high priest could not be found, except Jesus; whose 'one oblation of himself,' being of infinite value, rendered further sacrifices for ever needless. (Notes, 9:24—26. 10:1—10.) For the law made infirm and sinful men high priests, whose persons and services always needed atonement and forgiveness, and many of whom were men of bad character: "but the word" of the Lord, which he had ratified with an "oath," and which had been spoken, long after the giving of the law, and reached far beyond it, had appointed "the Son" of God to that office, who was in all respects competent to it, as he alone could be; and he was moreover "consecrated" or perfected "to it for evermore." (Note, 5:7—10.) It was therefore evident, that the Levitical priesthood was intended to typify, and prepare the way for that of Christ; which was pre-ordained in due time to supersede and disannul it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every part of scripture was intended, in one way or other, to honor our "King of righteousness and peace," our glorious High Priest and Saviour: and the more accurately we examine it, the fuller will be our conviction, that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." (Notes, Luke 24:25—31, 44—49. John 5:39—44. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9,10.) May we then learn in simplicity to trust in him, and submit to him, to copy his righteousness, to seek the peace of his kingdom, to devote all that we are and have to his service, and to expect blessings from him alone! May we go forth in our spiritual conflicts, at his word and in his strength; ascribe all our victories to his grace; and desire to be met and blessed by him in all our ways! Patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and angels, own him to be immensely better and greater than they all. Preceding events and dispensations, from the beginning, prepared the way for his appearance, and introduced his royal priesthood. Those institutions, which had divine authority and eminent usefulness for the time, after his coming were "disannulled," "because of the weakness and unprofitableness of them;" for "a better hope" was then introduced, "by which we draw nigh to" our offended "God," and call him, "Abba, Father." (Notes, 10:19—22. Rom. 8:14—17.) No further change shall now take place in the priesthood, or the worship of the church, by any future revelation from God: but he will "overturn, overturn, overturn," the kingdoms of the earth, till that of our Melchisedek be every where established. (Notes, Ez. 17:22—24. 21:25—27. Hag. 2:20—23.) As "the Surety of a far better covenant" than that connected with the Levitical priesthood, he has given his church, and every believer, the greatest advantages for following after perfection. May he stir up the hearts of his ministers and people, and pour out his Spirit, throughout all his church; that spiritual worship and holy obedience may every where abound; and that the congregations and services of his saints on earth may more resemble those of heaven!

V. 19—28.

It becomes us to aspire after a degree of spirituality and holiness, as much superior to those of Old Testament believers, as our advantages exceed theirs. No man who knows God, and his holy law of love, and who understands the evil of sin, and the difficulty of saving sinners to the glory of God, could desire the continuance of a priesthood, "according to a carnal commandment;" which appointed those to that office, who were themselves sinners, and needed to "offer sacrifices first for their own sins, and then for the people." But now, that the Son of God is made High Priest, even "such a High Priest as became us," being "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens;" we may well rejoice that he is "consecrated for evermore," and that he has an unchangeable priesthood. As "he is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God through him;" let the vilest of sinners approach in this way to the mercy-seat of our forgiving God, seeing "he ever liveth to make intercession for them." None need be dismayed, but those who will not "come unto God," or who will not come in the name of his beloved Son: and the case of those will soon become hopeless, how great soever their present presumption may be. But, let believers meditate on the power and grace of their great High Priest, and on his universal and absolute sovereignty; and let them copy his "holy, harmless, and undefiled" conduct, and "his separation from sinners." Then they may confidently expect, that he will "save them to the uttermost," and "deliver them, in all time of their tribulation, in all time of their wealth, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment."

CHAP. VIII.

Further evidence of the superiority of the Messiah's priesthood to that of Aaron, 1—6; and that it was predicted that the Sinai covenant would be abrogated, to make way for a new and better covenant, through a superior Mediator, 7—13.

Note.—The substance, or the summing up, of what had been advanced in the preceding discourse, was this, that Christians had "such a High Priest" as "became them," and was needful for them: who, having finished his work on earth, had ascended into the heavens, and was exalted to pre-eminent dignity and authority, at the right hand of God, in that place where he displays his glorious majesty, and which may be called his "throne." (Notes, 1: 3,4. 4:14—16. 12:2,3. Is. 66:1,2. Acts 7:44—50. Rev. 3:20—22. 4:1—5. 5:5—7. 7:9—17.) Thus Christ was constituted "the Minister" to officiate, in holy things, (Marg.) or "in the most holy place," of which that in the tabernacle had been a type. And in this office he presided over the "true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched" by his almighty power; and which was not constituted by human skill or labor, as the tabernacle in the wilderness had been. (Notes, Ex. 31:1—11.)—Some explain "the true tabernacle," of heaven exclusively, as signifying the same with "the sanctuary;" others interpret it of the human nature of Christ, in which he "tabernacled" among men, and in which he officiates, as High Priest, in the holy of holies above: yet, as his human nature is needful to constitute his Person as High Priest, rather than to be the place of his ministrations, the figure is harsh. But, as the whole tabernacle comprised the inner and the outer sanctuary; and, as the high priest alone went into the former, while the other priests officiated in the latter, in subordination to him, whose typical services rendered theirs accepted; and as the tabernacle was an emblem of the whole church of God, though it typified the human nature of Christ also; it seems most obvious, to explain "the true tabernacle," to signify the whole church of the redeemed on earth and in heaven, as one by its union with Christ Jesus: for believers, separately and collectively, "are the habitation of God through the Spirit." (Notes, Ex. 26:7—29. P. O.—Note, Eph. 2:19—22.) Christ ministers personally in the holy place above, as sole High Priest; he presides over the whole true tabernacle, and so the prayers and services of the spiritual priesthood, on earth, are rendered acceptable and efficacious, through his meritorious intercession in heaven. (Note, Luke 1:8—10.)

The sum. (1) Κεφαλαιον. Acts 22:28.—Note, Eph. 1:9—12.

<sup>6</sup> But now hath he <sup>m</sup> obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is <sup>n</sup> the Mediator of a better ‡ covenant, which was established <sup>o</sup> upon better promises.

Note.—As "every high priest," according to the law, was appointed to "offer gifts and sacrifices," that is, sin-offerings, burnt-offerings, and voluntary oblations; (Note, 5:1—4.) so it was requisite that this Person, even the Messiah, should have somewhat to offer, that the Anti-type might correspond with the type; and indeed for still far more cogent reasons. He therefore assumed human nature, appeared on earth, and there "gave himself a Sacrifice to God for the sins of his people." (Notes, 2:14, 15. 10:5—10.) Having accomplished this, (Note, John 19:28—30.) he ascended into heaven to appear before God, as with the blood of the sacrifice, in their behalf: all which exactly corresponded to the method prescribed to the high priest on the great day of expiation (Notes, Lev. 16:.) It was indeed not proper for him to continue on earth, after he had offered his one all-sufficient sacrifice: for in that case, he "would not have been a priest;" seeing, in respect of the legal services, "there were priests" appointed to perform them. Christ, not being of the priestly tribe, could not properly have interfered in them; and heaven was the appointed "sanctuary," in which he must perform the remainder of his meritorious and efficacious ministrations; being the true holy of holies, the place in which JEHOVAH displays his glory, and dispenses his blessings from the mercy-seat. (Notes, Ex. 25:10—22.) The priests indeed, who offered sacrifices in the earthly sanctuary, ministered in the worship of God after a ritual, which was formed to be "an exemplar and shadow of heavenly things." This had been intimated to Moses, when he was charged to form every thing relative to the tabernacle, according to the exact "pattern shown to him in the mount." (Note, Ex. 25: 40.)—(Note, Acts 7:44—50.)—The various particulars respecting Christ and his salvation, which were typified by the tabernacle, its furniture, and worship, have already been explained. (Notes, Ex. 25:—31.)—Instead of interfering with the priests in the typical services of the temple, Christ "had obtained a more excellent ministry," of real value and efficacy, in the heavenly sanctuary; in which he was as much superior to the priests after the order of Aaron, as the covenant, of which he was the Mediator, was "a better covenant," founded and established "on better promises," than the Sinai covenant with Israel.—It has repeatedly been observed, that all unbelievers continued personally under 'the covenant of works;' and that believers were personally interested in 'the covenant of grace,' by faith in the Messiah who was to come. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) The Mosaic dispensation contained in it a typical gospel, and its ordinances were to believers 'means of grace,' as well as acts of worship. But the covenant here referred to was that made with Israel as a nation, securing the possession of Canaan, and various temporal benefits to them, on prescribed conditions: and the promises of all spiritual blessings, and eternal life, to believers of all nations, and through all succeeding ages, which were openly revealed by the gospel, and ratified through Christ, are of infinitely greater value, than any temporal advantages to a single nation could be.—See, &c. (5) The quotation is not exactly according to the Septuagint, but gives the sense of the Hebrew.

7 For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for a second.

8 For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:

9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day when I took them by the hand, to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord.

10 For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people:

11 And they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest.

12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.

Note.—The Hebrews might indisputably learn from their own prophets, if they duly attended to them; that their national covenant, and the legal dispensation, were not intended to be perpetual. For if that covenant had been free from defect, and suited to bring the church to the highest state of perfection, to which it was to be advanced on earth, there would have been no place for a second covenant, or occasion of proposing any plans for it; as the Lord never changes his methods without reason. The Mosaic law indeed, and the Sinai covenant, were well suited to introduce the promised Messiah, and the gospel dispensation, and to form, as it were, a proper scaffolding for that magnificent edifice: (Note, Deut. 32:4.) yet they did not secure the sanctification and salvation of the people; nor did they even prevent such national apostacies, as were a forfeiture of all their privileges. About the time of the Babylonish captivity, therefore, the Lord, by his prophet Jeremiah, reproved the nation of Israel for their violations of his covenant, and promised to "make a new covenant" with his people; "putting his laws into their minds, and writing them in their hearts." already been fully explained, and a few hints must here suffice. (Note, Jer. 31:31—34.) The words, translated from the Hebrew, "Although I was a Husband unto them," are here rendered, as given from the Septuagint, "And I regarded them not." From this one clause, as it appears to me, the whole passage is generally spoken of by some learned men, as quoted from the Septuagint; but it varies from that version in several immaterial particulars, and, except in the above clause, it accords to the Hebrew.—This prophecy was fulfilled in the conversion of multitudes of Judah and Israel, in the primitive times of the gospel, and it foretel's the future conversion and restoration of that people: but it is also fulfilled to all the spiritual Israel, who are really "a holy nation," as Israel according to the flesh was relatively. And as it can be said of no other company, that they "all know the Lord;" it must be meant of them especially.—The repentance, faith, divine and efficacious teaching, and the sanctification of the chosen people of God, as well as the complete and final forgiveness of all their sins, how many and great soever, so that they should never more be remembered against them, were provided for, in the "better promises of this new covenant;" and thus their holy obedience, their final perseverance, and their eternal salvation were secured. The apostle, therefore, inferred conclusively from this prediction, that the promise of a new covenant had in effect "made the first old," or antiquated; and this was as much as to say, that it was "decaying, and about to vanish away." So that the abolition of the national covenant made with Israel, and the abrogation of the Mosaic law, would have been expected by the Jews, at the coming of the Messiah, according to their own prophets, if they had not erred from ignorance of the scriptures. (Notes, 7:1—22.)—It is undeniable, that the national covenant with Israel at Sinai, and not the 'covenant of works' with men in general, or the Abrahamic covenant, is spoken of.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

While we bless God, that of his plenteous mercy he has provided for us ruined sinners, "such a High Priest," as suited our helpless condition; that he has accepted his 'one oblation of himself;' that he has exalted him to "the right hand of his Majesty in the heavens," to be "a Minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle;" and that he has made a better covenant with him, in behalf of his true people, and with them through him, and established it on better promises, than those given to Israel; let us see to it, that we draw nigh to him in this appointed way, as spiritual worshippers, in humble faith, and submission to his righteousness, relying on his mercy and truth, and praying for all his promised blessings.—If it were dangerous for those, who had "the example and shadow of heavenly things," to deviate in the least from the divine prescriptions; how can they escape condemnation, who have the clear discovery of the heavenly things themselves, yet worship other mediators, prefer human traditions, come to God in their own name as if righteous persons, or refuse to come at all as if independent of him, under no obligations to him, and sufficient for their own felicity?—In every part of our worship and obedience, we should keep close to the only and perfect standard of scripture, and every deviation must be proportionably injurious: but mistakes, in the way of a sinner's access and acceptance, cannot but prove fatal in the end, if not previously discovered and rectified. (Notes, Rom. 9:24—29. 10:1—4. Gal. 1:6—10. 5:1—6.)

V. 7—13.

We should often inquire, whether "the new covenant" be really sealed and ratified to us: for, though the gospel dispensation is "faultless;" and though the Lord has, as it were, "taken us by the hand" to lead us forth from pagan and antichristian idolatry; yet he will have no special "regard to us" at last, unless he now "put his laws into our minds and write them in our hearts," as the principle of genuine repentance and willing obedience; unless we expect our happiness from him as our God, and worship him spiritually as his people; and unless we are taught by his Holy Spirit, to know him in such a manner, as uprightly to fear, love, trust, and obey him. (Notes, 1 Chr. 22:6—10. John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. 1 John 2:3—6.) Thus all true Israelites, "from the least to the greatest," are "taught of God," and sealed as his people; and thus they are become satisfied, that he "hath been merciful to their sins, and will remember their iniquities no more." This "righteousness shall be for ever, this salvation shall not be abolished," and the blessings of this irrevocable covenant will be the eternal portion of every true believer. But all other things, whether they be worldly vanities, external privileges, or forms and notions of religion, will soon "decay, wax old, vanish away," and leave those who have trusted in them most miserable for evermore. (Notes, 1:10—12. 2 Pet. 3:5—13.)

5 And <sup>n</sup> over it the cherubims of glory shadowing <sup>o</sup> the mercy-seat: of which we cannot now speak particularly.

Note.—The apostle, knowing the excessive and dangerous attachment of the Hebrews to the legal ceremonies, proceeded more particularly to show their typical reference to Christ. "The first covenant" had indeed "ordinances of divine worship," the observance of which constituted a considerable part of the legal righteousness of Israel, as a nation: and it had "a worldly sanctuary," built of such materials, and decorated with such magnificence, as this present world affords, and as carnal men admire. For Moses, at God's command, caused the tabernacle to be erected, which, besides the courts and the porch, consisted of two parts; in the first division, called "the holy place" or the sanctuary, were the candlestick, the table and the show-bread; and within the second veil, in the holiest of all, was the ark, and the other things here mentioned. (Notes, Ex. 16:32—34. 25:—27: 40:17—33. Num. 17:2—11.) "The golden censer," on which the high priest burned incense, within the veil, on the day of expiation, seems to have been left in the most holy place during the rest of the year. "The rod of Aaron and the golden pot that had manna," were within "the holy of holies," and by or near the ark, as the word may be rendered; but they seem not to have been put within it. (Note, 1 Kings 8:7—9.)—The typical import of all these things has been shown: and it is not necessary to speak of them particularly in this place, even as it was not for the apostle. "The golden altar of incense" is not mentioned in this catalogue; for what reason we know not: but the conjecture of some expositors, that the words rendered, "the golden censer," meant that altar, is groundless: for that was stationary in the first sanctuary, and was not used by the high priest on the day of atonement, who burned incense on a portable censer within the veil. (Note, Lev. 16:11—14.)—The first. (1) Many copies add σκηνη, tabernacle: but it appears to me, that some transcriber erroneously inserted that word, to supply the ellipsis: and that our version more properly substitutes, covenant, as directly connected with the preceding verse. (8:13.)

Ordinances. (1) Αραιωματα. Luke 1:6. Rom. 1:32. 2:26. 5:16,18. 8:4. Rev. 15:4. It is used in different senses; but ritual observances seems the meaning here. (Note, Luke 1:5—7.) The holiest of all. (3) Αγια αγιων, holy of holies. (Note, Ex. 26:31—33.)

7 But <sup>q</sup> into the second veil the high priest alone, once every year, <sup>r</sup>not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the <sup>s</sup> errors of the people:

Note.—When all the particulars, above mentioned, had been prepared, according to God's appointment; the ordinary priests performed the several parts of their office in "the first sanctuary," at all times, without further limitation. But "the high priest alone" was allowed to go into the most holy place; nay, he was not allowed to enter thither more than once, or on one day, in the year; nor even on that day, till he had offered sacrifices for his own transgressions, and those of the nation; and then he took the blood of the sin-offering within the veil, to sprinkle before the mercy-seat. (Notes, Lev. 16:.) Thus out of Israel, that holy nation, one holy tribe was selected; of that tribe, one holy family; and of that family, one person to be "holiness to the Lord;" yet even this person, so carefully selected from the whole race of men, might not approach God "on a mercy-seat," without atoning blood, and only one day in a year; on pain of death for his presumption, if he transgressed these rules!—Some commentators mention carrying the blood of the sacrifices in general, into the temple, to sprinkle it before the veil, as one of the services performed by the ordinary priests: but it is evident that no blood was carried into the tabernacle, except that of sin offerings for the high priest or for the congregation; and this was done by this high priest himself. In other cases, when some of the blood had been sprinkled about the altar of burnt offering; the residue was poured out at the bottom of it. (Notes, 13:9—14. Lev. 1:5—9. 4:4—7, 22—35. 6:30. 16:11—19.)

Errors. (7) Αγνοηματα. Here only N.T.—Gen. 43:12. Sept.—Ignorances. It seems to denote all those sins, for which sacrifices were appointed; indeed all, but those presumptuous sins which were punished by death. (Notes, Lev. 4:5. 6:2—7. Ps. 19:12—14.)

Note.—By all those restrictions and limitations, which kept even the worshippers of JEHOVAH at so awful a distance, "the Holy Spirit," by whose inspiration they were revealed and recorded, conveyed this important instruction; namely, that "the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest." (Note, 1—5.) This instruction was constantly inculcated, as long as the "first tabernacle was standing," and the ceremonies of that worship continued in force. For the temple, being formed after the pattern of the tabernacle made by Moses, and having the same ministrations performed at it, might be considered as the continuation of it; and "the first tabernacle," is here distinguished from that "greater and more perfect tabernacle," afterwards mentioned. (11,12.) So that the holy places, in which the priests of Aaron's family ministered till the coming of Christ, are evidently meant.—A few believers indeed, under the divine teaching, discerned something in these rites concerning the way of access to God, of communion with him, and of admission into heaven, through the promised Redeemer: but the Israelites in general looked no further than the external forms; and scarcely any person conceived an idea, that sinners of every nation should have that freedom and boldness of access to God through Christ, and all the privileges and hopes, which believers enjoy under the Christian dispensation. The difficulty of guilty polluted rebels being thus admitted into the presence and favor of a holy God, was fully declared by those appointments: but the sacrifice and priesthood of the incarnate Son of God at once disannulled them all. When he hung upon the cross, the veil of the temple was rent. (Notes, Matt. 27:51—53.) His ascension into heaven, and intercession there, opened the way to the mercy-seat; by his doctrine "the way into the holiest was made manifest;" and thenceforth it was only necessary, that sinners should be made willing by regenerating grace, to avail themselves of such an invaluable privilege. (Note, 10:19—22.) The legal ordinances, therefore, especially those of the great day of atonement, were figures "for the time then present;" (or, as some render it, of the present time, the happy period thus prefigured being at length arrived;) in which were offered various gifts and sacrifices, that could not give the worshippers genuine solid peace of conscience, or make a perfect reconciliation between the sinner and the offended Judge. The offerers who rested in them, and did not by faith rely on the promised Saviour, could not obtain forgiveness of sins, or spiritual blessings; but were only exempted from temporal punishment, and admitted to external privileges, as members of the kingdom and church of Israel, which was in a peculiar sense under the government of JEHOVAH. (Note, 11—14.) The other ordinances of that covenant, which were connected with its sacrifices, consisted principally of regulations concerning meats and drinks, the latter especially in respect of the priests, and the Nazarites; and divers baptisms, or washings with water, or in water, as typical of sanctification, and such like institutions which were carnal in themselves; though for wise purposes they were "imposed" till the coming of the Messiah, which was to be a time of reformation, by the introduction of a more simple and spiritual worship. (Note, John 4:21—24.) They could therefore be of no use to those Jews, who rejected Christ out of zeal for them, and it was absurd for the Hebrew Christians to adhere so pertinaciously to them.—The Holy Ghost, &c.

(8) This is a most express attestation to the divine inspiration of Moses, which should not pass without special notice, in these days of skepticism on that subject.

Standing. (8) Ἐχοῦσης ἑστῶν, retained its station. The temple which succeeded to the tabernacle, and must be included in all this argument along with it, was standing when the apostle wrote: but after the introduction of the gospel, it virtually lost its station and use, in true religion.—A figure. (9) Παράβολη. 11:19. was appointed to do, by officiating as "a High Priest, in a greater and more perfect tabernacle," than that prepared by Moses, and even than the temple built by Solomon, or any made with hands: "that is to say," in one, not builded after the manner of men, or even like the lower creation; being the contrivance of infinite wisdom, and the work of almighty power. This may be explained, either of his holy human nature, in which he tabernacled on earth, and officiated as Priest in heaven; (Note, John 1: 14.) or rather of the heavens themselves, where "he appears in the presence of God for us." (Note, 24—26.) Nor did he make atonement for sin, "by the blood of goats or calves;" and enter into the most holy place with it; but, having shed his own most precious blood on earth, as in the court of the sanctuary, "he entered in, once for all," into the true holy place in heaven, to plead the merit of it before the Father's throne, as the complete expiation of all the sins of his people; having thus "obtained eternal redemption" for them, from wrath, and sin, and all its consequences; and being assured, that no further atonement would ever be required in their behalf. (Notes, 10:1—10.) "For if the blood of bulls and goats," and other irrational creatures, could avail to expiate the guilt of the nation, or of individuals, on the day of atonement, or on other occasions; (Notes, Lev. 4: 16:) and if "the ashes of an heifer" mixed with water, and sprinkling those who were unclean through the touch of a dead body, could produce a typical external sanctity, by which they might be admitted into the congregation of the Lord; (Notes, Num. 19:) how much more efficacy might be supposed in the blood of Christ, actually to remove guilt and defilement! His divine nature, the entire purity of his human nature, the exalted dignity of his person, as EMMANUEL; the honor put on the law of God by his most perfect obedience; and the voluntary offering of himself, under the immediate influences of "the eternal Spirit," as a spotless sacrifice to divine justice in the stead of sinners, concurred to render it glorious in God, for his sake, fully to pardon, and freely to accept, all who were interested in him by faith. If then, there was the least efficacy in external expiations and purifications, through the appointment of God, and because they showed the guilt and pollution of sin, and typified the method of its removal, so that it became proper for God through them to confer temporal benefits on criminals; how much more efficacious must the blood of Christ be, "to purge the believer's conscience from dead works," from the guilt of those evil works, which were committed by such as were dead in sin, and deserved death; or which really and deeply polluted the soul, even as the touch of a dead corpse ritually did the body! As, therefore, it was abundantly suited to render the exercise of mercy, consistent with the most perfect justice and holiness, and honorable to God to accept the services of sinners who believed; so, when apprehended by faith, it effectually removes the burden of guilt from the conscience, and gives the trembling sinner peace, confidence, and comfort, in approaching, worshipping, and obeying the living God. Christians therefore could have no occasion to cleave to the abrogated typical expiations of the Mosaic law.—Some expositors, by "the eternal Spirit," suppose the Deity of the Son to be meant: but this seems rather to be implied in the word CHRIST. The holiness and obedience of our Saviour, his miraculous powers, and the supports given to his human nature, are constantly ascribed to the Holy Spirit, "with which he was anointed without measure," sealing his appointment to his mediatorial offices; and as he was carried through his last scene of sufferings, by his most perfect zeal and love, which also gave value to his sacrifice. (Notes, 1:8,9. Ps. 45: 6,7. Is. 11:2—5. 42:1—4. 59:20,21. 61:1—3. Matt. 3:16,17. John 3:27—36. Acts 1:1—3. 10:36—43.) The Holy Spirit therefore seems to be intended, whose eternal Deity (as well as the everlasting value and efficacy of Christ's atonement,) is attested by the epithet here employed. The Levitical services were all "shadows of heavenly things:" the expiations were, therefore, types of some real expiation. 'Now what expiation is there in the whole universe, if the Sacrifice of Christ is excluded?' Mac knight.

Eternal redemption. (12) Αἰώνια λύτρωσις. Luke 1:68. 2:38. The word is sometimes used for temporal deliverances, from bondage or captivity; but the redemption which Christ effected is distinguished as "eternal redemption." (Notes, 15—17. 5:7—10. 10:11—18. Eph. 1:3—8. Tit. 2:14. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. Rev. 5:8—10.)

Note.—Because of the unceasing and inexhaustible efficacy of his sacrifice, Christ was appointed to be "the Mediator of the new covenant." He had undertaken the cause of sinners, which must otherwise have been relinquished as desperate; as he alone was capable of offering a sacrifice of sufficient value, to make a real atonement: and he had come into the world, in human nature, for that purpose; in order by means of his death, to pay a ransom to God for the transgressions, which had been committed by believers, under the old covenant, or the legal dispensation; even those who lived before his coming, as well as all others who were called by the grace of God to faith in him, "might receive the promise of eternal inheritance." (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26.)

For the temporal inheritance alone was secured to the Israelites, by their observance of the legal expiations; and those of them, who sought and obtained spiritual and eternal blessings, were made partakers of them through the anticipated efficacy of Christ's redemption. That grace was finally confirmed to them by his death: so that, in this respect, the covenant he meditated might also be considered as a Testament, by which a man bequeaths certain legacies to persons specified in it, to be given to them in consequence of his death. Thus Christ might be considered, as having acquired, in his mediatorial office, a conditional right to dispose of spiritual and eternal blessings, as by his will and Testament. These he bequeathed to all such, as should apply for them by faith: and though, as a special favor, some were, before his coming, made partakers of them, in consequence of his unfailing engagements to assume human nature, and make redemption for their transgressions; yet even their right was incomplete till after his death, and all others must be admitted to claim them on that ground only. For when "a Testament is made," "the death of the testator must" of necessity take place, before the legacies can be claimed. It is of no validity till he be dead: for, as he may change it at pleasure while he lives, it has no force till afterwards. Thus Christ died, not only to obtain the blessings of salvation for us; but to give efficacy to his testamentary disposal of them: though he is different from all other testators, in that he rose again, and ever liveth to be the Executor of his own testament, for the benefit of all who are interested in it.—Thus the passage has generally been interpreted: but this is the only place, in which the original word is expressly used in scripture for a testament, or the will of a dying person. The change of the meaning also, from covenant to testament, seems unprecedented: "the Mediator of a testament," and "the blood of a testament," are expressions, to which it is difficult to annex any precise ideas; and the Sinai-covenant can hardly in any sense be called "a testament." Several modern expositors have therefore endeavored to establish another interpretation.—"For this reason, ... of the new covenant he is the Mediator, or High Priest, 'by whom its blessings are dispensed, and also 'the Sacrifice, by which it is procured and ratified; that, his death being accomplished, for 'obtaining the pardon of the transgressions of 'the first covenant, believers of all ages and 'nations, as the called seed of Abraham, ... may 'receive the promised eternal inheritance. For '... where a covenant is made by sacrifice, 'there is a necessity, that the death of the 'appointed sacrifice be produced. For, according to the practice of God and man, a covenant is made firm over dead sacrifices; seeing 'it never hath force, whilst the goat, calf, or 'bullock, appointed as the sacrifice of ratification, liveth. Because from the beginning, 'God ratified his covenants by sacrifice, to 'serve among men the expectation of the 'Sacrifice of his Son; hence not even the covenant

'at Sinai was made without sacrifice.' Mac-knight. (Notes, 18—23. Gen. 15:7—21. Jer. 34:18,19.)—It appears to me, that the original will admit of this interpretation; but the nature of this work does not allow of my enlarging on the criticisms by which it is supported. On the one hand, the cavils, which have been raised against the apostle's reasoning as inconclusive, if the first interpretation be adopted; and on the other hand, the venerable names, which have sanctioned it, with other circumstances of a similar nature, render me afraid of too confidently preferring either interpretation. I cannot, however, on the whole, but think, that the latter exposition is the most obvious, and consonant to the apostle's general way of reasoning.

19 For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people, according to the law, he took <sup>p</sup> the blood of calves, and of goats, with water, <sup>q</sup> and † scarlet wool, <sup>r</sup> and hyssop, and <sup>s</sup> sprinkled both the book and all the people,

Note.—To prefigure the necessity of the blood-shedding of Christ, even the Sinai-covenant had not been dedicated, or ratified, without blood. For after the law of ten commandments had been delivered from the mount, and "Moses had spoken every precept to the people, according to" the outlines of that "law," on which their national covenant was established, and they had consented to it; he wrote them in a book, and proceeded to the solemn ratification of the covenant, as a typical mediator between God and the nation. (Notes, Ex. 24:1—11.)—The apostle specified some particulars, which are not found in the history; probably taking them from the usages of his people, on some occasions. To prevent the blood from coagulating, it was customary to mix it with water, that it might sprinkle the better, (which was an apt emblem of the two-fold benefit of Christ's atonement;) and then putting "scarlet wool" upon a stalk of "hyssop," they sprinkled the blood with it. (Notes, Lev. 14:4—7. Ps. 51:7.)—The Hebrews also knew, that Moses had afterwards sprinkled the tabernacle and all its furniture with blood, to consecrate them for the worship of God. (Marg. Ref. v.—Notes, 8—10. Lev. 16:18—22.) In short, it was a general rule, that "almost every thing was by the law purified with blood;" which showed, that nothing could be clean to a sinner, not even his religious duties, except as his guilt was expiated by the death of a sacrifice of sufficient value for that end, and unless he continually depended on it. And indeed it was absolutely a universal rule, that "without the shedding of blood," no kind or degree of sin was ever pardoned, or the punishment due to it remitted. (Note, 10:3,4.) It was then necessary, by the appointment of the law, that the "patterns," exemplars, or types of heavenly things should be purified by the sacrifice of innocent animals, and by the application of their blood; or they could not be acceptably used in the worship of God: but it was also necessary, for more durable and immutable reasons, that the "heavenly things themselves should be purified by better sacrifices than these," or, by an expiation of superior excellence, even by the One sacrifice of the death of Christ, which was infinitely more valuable than all of them. In order to his efficaciously interceding for sinners in heaven, and opening for them the way to the mercy-seat; that they might commune with their reconciled Father, in his ordinances, and at length be admitted into heaven: it was indispensably necessary that Christ should on earth, in our nature, shed his blood, and die a Sacrifice on the cross; that he might have the infinite merit of that Sacrifice to plead before the throne, in behalf of all who should "come unto God by him;" otherwise mercy, shown to sinners, would dishonor the justice and holiness of God, and their admission into heaven would, as it were, defile that holy place. (Note, 6:16—20. 10:1—4.)—This, &c. (20) The quotation is not from the Septuagint, but agrees in meaning both with that and the Hebrew. (Ex. 24:8.)

25 Nor yet that he should <sup>f</sup> offer himself often, <sup>g</sup> as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others;

26 For then must he often have suffered since <sup>h</sup> the foundation of the world: but now once, <sup>i</sup> in the end of the world, hath <sup>k</sup> he appeared to put away sin by <sup>l</sup> the sacrifice of himself.

Note.—Christ had "not entered into the holy places," made by the hands of men, in order to be "the figures of the true," for which the blood of animals might be a suitable consecration: but he had entered "into heaven itself," to appear in the immediate presence of God, as the Advocate for rebels and enemies, and in order to procure them full pardon, abundant grace, and eternal life; and a sacrifice of proportionably superior value was necessary, that he might perform this ministration, to the glory of God, and the salvation of all who believed in him. (Notes, 4:14—16. 1 John 2:1,2.) This had been provided in "the sacrifice of himself;" and there was no need that he should repeat his atoning sufferings and death; after the manner of the high priest, who "every year" went into the holy place with blood of others, even of the animals slain for sin-offerings: for in that case Christ "must often have suffered," since the first entrance of sin, soon after the foundation of the world, when the efficacy of his gracious interposition in behalf of sinners began. (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) This indeed he must have done, if the sacrifice had been of small, or even of finite value; as it would have been, if he had been a mere man, or a mere creature. But, on the contrary, the intrinsic and infinite value of his sacrifice appeared, in that, after he had been predicted and promised for four thousand years, and sinners had all along been saved by faith in him; he at length appeared in human nature, once, in the last period of the world, when the concluding dispensation was to be introduced; that, by the one "sacrifice of himself," he might make an all-sufficient expiation of sin; and both provide for the full pardon of all the sins of the numberless multitudes of believers, through every age and nation; and also for the destruction of sin out of their hearts and nature, by their progressive sanctification: that so they might be made as righteous, holy, and happy, as if they never had been sinners. So immense was the value and efficacy of his one oblation! (Notes, Rom. 5:12—21.) the sins of many: and unto <sup>a</sup> them that look for him, shall <sup>r</sup> he appear the second time, <sup>s</sup> without sin <sup>t</sup> unto salvation.

Note.—By the sentence denounced on the human race in Adam, “the surety of the covenant of works,” it had been “appointed for men once to die,” from which Enoch and Elijah alone had been excepted. It was also “appointed” to all men, without one exception, that after death they must appear in judgment before God, and receive an eternal recompense of their conduct during their lives on earth; which judgment must be unto condemnation to all *sinner*s, who have not previously obtained a pardon. And as, “without shedding of blood there is no remission” of sins, nor could the legal sacrifices really atone for them; so Christ, “the second Adam,” the Surety of his people, had once offered himself, “to bear the sins of many,” even of all the multitudes who ever did or ever shall believe in him; that thus he might fully expiate them, and make way for their entire pardon and complete salvation. So that, though they are not exempted from the stroke of death; they are delivered from the penalty, the sting, and the consequences of death: (Note, 1 Cor. 15:55—58.) and they will at length be made conquerors over that terrible enemy, and thus be justified in Christ at the day of judgment, and inherit eternal life through him. He therefore, having effectually accomplished his work of making atonement for sin, needed not to appear on earth again, “in the likeness of sinful flesh,” to be “numbered with transgressors,” and be “made sin for us:” but he will at last “appear” in another form, in all his mediatorial and personal glory, as the omnipotent, omniscient, and righteous Judge of the world; in order to complete the salvation of all those, who believe in him, “look for him,” wait for his coming, and prepare to meet him, by faith, hope, love, and patient obedience. (Notes, Phil. 3:20,21. 1 *The*s. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 4:6—8. Tit. 2:13,14. 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)—It is generally supposed, that some of the expressions, in the latter part of this chapter, allude to the ceremonies, used on the great day of atonement: particularly, “the scape-goat bare,” or carried away, the sins of the people into the wilderness; and the high priest, when he had entered into the holy of holies, in linen garments, came forth to the people in his splendid sacerdotal robes, to pronounce the blessing upon them. (Notes, Lev. 16:20—25.)—“Did he not appear the first time without sin? Yes ‘certainly, as to any inherent guilt; for the ‘scripture says, “He had no sin.” What then is the meaning of this opposition, that at his ‘first coming “he bare our sins,” but at his second coming “he shall appear without sin unto ‘salvation?’ These words can have no other ‘imaginable sense but this, that at his first coming he sustained the person of a sinner, and ‘suffered instead of us: but his second coming ‘shall be on another account, and he shall appear, not as a Sacrifice, but as a Judge.’ Abp. Tillotson.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

“The ordinances of divine service, and the worldly sanctuary” of the Mosaic covenant, point out to us Christ as the Light of the church and of the world, and “the Bread of life” to our souls; (Notes, John 1:4—9. 6:30—35,47—58. P. O. 30—35,47—59.) and remind us of his divine Person, his fruitful Priesthood which flourishes for ever, his perfect righteousness, and his all-prevailing intercession; “which things the angels desire to look into” with admiring praise and adoration.—At what a distance has sin placed us from our holy Creator; when all the preparatory sacrifices of the law still left the worshippers secluded, and in a sense banished, even from the presence of God on his mercy-seat! All these sacrifices and services could no more purge the guilty conscience, than distinctions in meats, and divers “baptisms,” could cleanse the polluted heart, or new create the fallen nature of man. “Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,” that “the Way into the holiest” is now manifested, by the coming, sacrifice, and ascension of our great High Priest! Now we “sinners of the Gentiles” may come with far more “boldness to the throne of grace” than Israel’s pontiff himself could: and now the gate of heaven is thrown open to all believers. Eternal redemption, and the promise of eternal inheritance, are purchased for us by “the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God.” This effectually purges the most guilty “conscience from dead works to serve the living God;” whilst the grace, which seals the pardon, new creates the polluted soul. May we then be made “partakers of this heavenly calling,” and seek remission of our sins, only through the shedding and sprinkling of “the blood of the New Testament,” which God has enjoined unto us! (Note, 13:20,21.)

V. 15—29.

We must never presume to approach God, except upon a mercy-seat, and in the name of our great High Priest, who is “entered into heaven to appear in his presence for us.” All our hopes and blessings must be sought as the fruit of the agonizing, yet voluntary death of our gracious Saviour, the legacy of his dying love, and the gift of his royal munificence to rebellious creatures. We must ascribe even our sanctification, and all our real good works, to the same all-procuring cause; and attend on divine ordinances, and offer our spiritual sacrifices, as “sprinkled with his blood,” and so purified from their defilement. Nay, we must expect admission into heaven, as the place which he has prepared for us, through the presenting of his blood, for the ransom of our souls, and the purchase of our inheritance; which would otherwise have been contaminated by our entrance into it. Thus we should in all things learn the inestimable value of the “one sacrifice,” which Christ once appeared on earth to offer for us; that we may know our interest in his covenant, and be “constrained by his love” to the most devoted and unreserved obedience. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) In this manner we shall be reconciled to the appointed stroke of death, and look forward to judgment with cheerful hope; and so wait prepared for his coming the second "time without sin" to perfect our salvation. But as no wisdom, learning, virtue, wealth, reputation, or authority, can exempt one of our race from the sentence of death, and as no man can redeem his brother from death; (Note, Ps. 49:6—9.) so nothing can deliver a sinner from condemnation at the day of judgment, except an interest in the atoning sacrifice of Christ; nor will one be saved from eternal punishment, who has despised, refused, or neglected this great salvation. For, though in the concerns of this world, the criminal suffers many painful effects of his offences, previous to his trial; yet the sentence of the law is not executed, nor the threatened vengeance inflicted, till he has been arraigned, convicted, and condemned at the appointed tribunal.

CHAP. X.

The inefficacy of the legal sacrifices is shown from the frequent repetition of them, 1—4. The abolition of them, and the substitution of the Sacrifice of Christ, was foretold by the Psalmist, 5—9; and is that by which believers obtain eternal remission, 10—13. Exhortations to faith, prayer, and constancy in the gospel; and to love and good works, 13—25. The danger of willfully renouncing Christ, after having received the knowledge of the truth; with solemn warnings, exhortations, and encouragements, 26—35.

FOR the law, <sup>a</sup> having a shadow of good things to come, and <sup>b</sup> not the very image of the things, can never, <sup>c</sup> with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect.

2 For then * would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers <sup>e</sup> once purged should have had no more conscience of sins.

Note.—As the Hebrews would be extremely backward in acceding to the apostle's conclusions, concerning the inefficacy of the legal expiations; he proceeded still further to argue with them, on that important subject. He observed, that the ceremonial law had only a "shadow of the good things to come" to the church by the Messiah, and not so much as "the very image of them." Its ordinances rather resembled, faintly and obscurely, the way of salvation through Christ, and the several blessings conferred on believers through him, as a shadow, or the sketch and outline of a picture, resembles a man; than gave a lively or adequate idea of them, as the reflection in a mirror, a good portrait, or statue, does of the person thus represented. The sacrifices therefore, which were constantly offered, "every year," on the great day of atonement, could not make the very persons, who came into the courts of the temple on that solemn occasion, free from the guilt of their offences, or accepted with God. He was pleased, indeed, to exempt Israel from punishment, and to continue to the nation their external benefits, while they adhered to the prescribed worship: but they, who were actually pardoned and saved, received those blessings by faith in the promised Messiah. (Notes, 7:15, 19. 9:8—10. 11:39, 40.) This must be allowed to have been the case: for if the sacrifices could have completely atoned for the sins of the people, would they not have been discontinued, as no further necessary? The worshippers, having been once purged from their guilt, would have no more been burdened with such a conscience of sins, as requiring more and further sacrifices to take it away. This is the privilege of Christians: for the sacrifice of Christ, being of intrinsic and infinite value and efficacy, there is no occasion that it should be repeated: but believers, having once had "their consciences purged from dead works by faith in his blood," are perfectly justified and accepted unto eternal life. (Note, 9:11—14.) Thenceforth they seek no other sacrifice; they are no more brought under condemnation; they continually apply, in the exercise of penitent faith, the unfailing efficacy of that one all-sufficient atonement to their consciences; and thus they preserve inward peace, connected with humiliation and tenderness of conscience, notwithstanding the remains of sin in their hearts, and the guilt which they thence contract in their daily conduct.—"Would they not, &c."

(2) Some render this, "They would not have ceased to be offered." That is, they would have continued to be offered, being efficacious and adequate. But it is plain, from the apostle's previous reasoning on several things contained in the Old Testament, that this was never intended. The reading with an interrogation seems to be founded on the best authority, and is most satisfactory.—If any sacrifice had been offered of sufficient efficacy to atone for sin, there would have been no need for a continual repetition of it; and that repetition showed the inefficacy of the most solemn legal sacrifices. On the contrary, when the one sacrifice of Christ had been offered, the legal sacrifices were virtually abolished; no other sacrifice was required; no repetition was necessary; the end was fully answered; nothing, except faith in him, was needful; and the appointed ordinances were no longer prefigurations, but memorials, of his one all-sufficient atonement.

Shadow. (1) Σκιαν. 8:5. Col. 2:17.—Image.] Εἰκονα. See on Rom. 1:23.

4 For it is <sup>e</sup> not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should <sup>f</sup> take away sins.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle's argument implied, that no sacrifice could really atone for sin, or bring sinners into a state of acceptance with God unto eternal life, which did not make full satisfaction to his offended justice, and render it honorable to him to remit the punishment of it. But the legal sacrifices were so far from being thus efficacious, that they did not suffice for the individuals, or the generation of Israel, who presented them, even in respect of a permanent exemption from temporal judgments. For the most solemn of them, at the day of atonement, was rather an annual remembrance of their sins, than a removal of the guilt of them: so that they had only a respect to the year which was past; and the same remembrance was made of sins, when the day returned the next year. Indeed it was not "possible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sin," by making an actual atonement to divine justice for it. As divine appointments, such sacrifices might be a suitable acknowledgment of guilt, and profession of repentance, and reliance on the mercy of God, on account of which he might bear with the Israelites, and give them temporal benefits: and they aptly typified the sacrifice of Christ. But they could not possibly render pardoning mercy, in its most plenteous exercise, consistent with the infinite justice and holiness of God; without which nothing could take away sin, according to the apostle's reasoning in this place. (Notes, 8:1,2. 9:18—23. Rom. 3:21—26.)—The same argument equally proves, that the blood of a mere man, or of a mere creature, "cannot take away sin." A guilty creature deserves wrath for his own crimes. If a perfectly holy man had the full disposal of his own life and soul, and could be willing to devote them to destruction, in the stead of a single guilty person; his life might be an adequate ransom for the other's life, his soul for the other's soul; but this must be all: and even in this case, we cannot conceive that God would appoint, allow, or accept such a substitution. If the most exalted of mere creatures should willingly assume our nature, and suffer temporal death, in its most horrible forms, for our salvation; we may easily perceive that the atonement, or compensation to justice would be very small, when compared with the guilt to be pardoned, and the punishment to be remitted, for the sake of it: nor could this render it consistent with the perfect justice of God, to pardon the atrocious and innumerable rebellions of unnumbered millions, and to give them eternal life, in consideration of it. If "without shedding of blood there could be no remission," it must have been, because God saw that sin fully deserved his wrath, and the curse denounced against it; and that it could not consist with perfect distributive justice to remit the punishment, except through a vicarious sacrifice. And if "the blood of bulls and goats could not possibly take away sin;" it must have been, because they were not a sufficient satisfaction to divine justice; or, in other words, a sufficient declaration of God's holy hatred of sin, his judgment of its desert, and his determination to maintain the honor of his broken law, in order to render it consistent with his glory, finally to pardon sinners on account of the sacrifice offered. Now it must be evident, that the crucifixion of Peter, or of Paul, even if free from sin, would have exhibited nothing decisive in this matter; there would have been no equality between the sufferer or his sufferings, and the criminals to be pardoned, and the punishment to be remitted for the sake of it: and the case must still be the same, how high soever we ascend in the scale of created beings. But when "God manifested in the flesh" became the Sacrifice, and his death upon the cross the Ransom; when "God purchased the church with his own blood;" the Sufferer being of infinite dignity, his voluntary sufferings were of infinite value. The perfect justice and holiness of God, and the honor of his law, are as legible in the cross of Christ, as his love to sinners: his infinite purity, and infinite mercy, unite in perfect and eternal harmony; while unnumbered millions of rebels, who deserve the final wrath of God, are pardoned, and made heirs of eternal felicity, through this satisfaction of inestimable value. We may perceive, that this was an expedient adequate to its object; and that such a sacrifice would suffice for the sins of the whole world, if all men actually came to God through it. It is necessary for us to insist upon this, not only as comprising an unanswerable argument for the real Deity and the proper atonement of Christ, but because many, who profess to believe both these truths, under color of blaming metaphysical exactness in stating doctrines, and affecting to treat the orthodox reformers, doctrinal Puritans, and modern preachers of the gospel, as men of narrow minds, advance many things contrary to the apostle's reasoning in this passage: as if Christ's sacrifice derived all its efficacy from the appointment of God, and not from his personal Deity and excellency; (which was "the altar that sanctified the gift;") and as if, had the Lord so pleased, an inferior sacrifice might have equally answered the purpose. But surely they forget, that God appointed the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as well as that of his Son: yet "it was not possible" for the former to take away sin, but the latter at once effected it, because of its intrinsic value.—'Divine acceptance must not be assigned as the only cause, that the oblation of our Saviour's body was thus available for the expiation of the guilt of sin: for then no reason can be given why he might not have accepted of the blood of bulls and goats, and much more of the sufferings of any ordinary man. ... But the great reason, why "the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sins" is this, that they could never answer the great ends of punishment, and thereby render it consistent with the honor of the governor, and with the ends of government, to admit the substitution of them in our stead. ... By the obedience of our Lord Jesus Christ unto the death, in our stead, these ends of punishment are very signally obtained, and that with more advantage to God's glory, than if the punishment of our offences had been inflicted upon us; and so God, by it, may be truly said to have been satisfied, seeing that justice ... is truly satisfied, when all those ends for which the punishment of the offender could be desired, are obtained. ... 1. God by this dispensation hath given us the best and most effectual example, to deter us from sin. ... If he, who was the well beloved Son of God, found it so dreadful to lie under the burden for some hours; to lie exposed for ever to it must be far more intolerable. ... If on this account, "God spared not his own Son," we may be sure he will not spare his stubborn enemies. ... 2. God, by this method, hath taken a most excellent way for reformation of the sinner. ... 3. God, by this dispensation, hath sufficiently consulted the preservation of his honor, and secured the reverence and observation of his laws, ... seeing he hath, by this example, let all men know, that, though he be a God of great long-suffering and mercy, he will by no means clear the sinner, or suffer sin to go unpunished. ... But that none of these ends could be at all obtained, by the substitu-

'tion of a bull, or goat, or ram, to suffer in our 'stead, must be extremely evident; ... for this 'would rather tempt men to conceive that God's 'displeasure against sin could not be great, ... 'and that he was not much concerned for any 'satisfaction for the violations of his law, when 'such slight matters were by him thought sufficient expiations for them.' Whitby.

Note.—To prove his doctrine in the most unanswerable manner, the apostle referred the Hebrews to a remarkable prophecy of the Messiah; which showed that his coming was the necessary consequence of the inefficacy of the legal sacrifices, and of the Lord's purpose of saving sinners. (Note, Ps. 40:6—8.) The Messiah, speaking concerning his "coming into the world," remarked that JEHOVAH had no delight in the sacrifices of the law; (Notes, Ps. 50:7—15. Is. 1:10—15.) but "that he had prepared a body for him."—When JEHOVAH received no satisfaction from the legal sacrifices, not merely because the people rested in them after a formal and self-righteous manner, but especially because they did not sufficiently display the honor of his justice in pardoning sinners; the eternal Son declared his readiness to come into the world in human nature for that purpose, according as it had been written of him in "the volume of the book," or in opening the roll of prophecy, in which he had been promised as "the Seed of the woman." (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) Now the apostle argued from this, that the evident contrast in the prophecy quoted, between "the sacrifices, in which JEHOVAH had no pleasure," and the obedience of the Messiah to his whole will, in which he would be fully satisfied, was an evident intimation, that he intended to remove the former, in order to establish the latter in its full glory, and as the only ground of sinners being pardoned and saved. By this will of God, perfectly performed by Christ, in his obedience unto the death upon the cross, Christians were "sanctified" and consecrated to God, as accepted and spiritual worshippers; "through the offering of his body once for all," with which his mediatorial obedience had been completed. (Note, 13:9—14.)—"From this memorable passage of the fortieth Psalm we learn, that the only expiation for sin, which God ever appointed, is the sacrifice of his Son in the human nature; that all the sacrifices, which he appointed to the Israelites, were nothing but emblems of the sacrifice of Christ; and that, the sacrifice of Christ being offered, the emblems of it are now fitly laid aside; that under the gospel dispensation, there might remain to mankind no sacrifice, having pretension to take away sin, but the sacrifice of Christ, expressly established by God himself, as the meritorious cause of our pardon." Macknight.—When he cometh. (5) (Note, 1 Tim. 1:15,16.—A body, &c.) The words in the Psalm are, "mine ears hast thou opened," or "bored;" (Note, Ex. 21:3—6.) and it has perplexed many expositors to determine why the apostle, writing to the Hebrews, should quote from the Septuagint, where that translation evidently differs from the Hebrew. But he probably supposed that the words conveyed the general meaning of the passage: and that the production of the holy human nature of Christ was that preparation for his mediatorial obedience, which was intended by that expression, "mine ears hast thou opened." The quotation, however, is not exactly from the Septuagint, which seems to have been made from some other reading, than that found in our present copies. The meaning, however, and the apostle's argument, are not at all affected by the variation.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—“Every priest” of Aaron’s order stood, as a servant at his work, “offering” repeatedly the same ineffectual sacrifices: some of the priests did this every day; and the high priest did it every year on the day of atonement. (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, 1, 2, 7:26, 28.) But “this Person,” or this Priest, even Christ, after the offering of one sacrifice, (because that was of infinite value and eternal efficacy,) “sat down” at the right hand of God, as “a Priest upon his throne;” from that time waiting the fulfilment of the prophecy or promise, which engaged that all his enemies should be put under his feet. (Notes, 7:1—3, 11—17. Ps. 110:1. Matt. 22:41—46. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) For by his one oblation, he had provided effectually for the perfect justification unto eternal life, of all those who should ever receive his atonement, by faith springing from regeneration, and evidenced “by the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience,” and who were thus set apart and consecrated to the service of God. To this the Holy Spirit had borne testimony in the scripture, which had been before quoted. (Note, 8:7—13.) According to the covenant, there spoken of, when the laws of God are written in the heart, every kind and degree of sin is for ever pardoned: for Christ “by his one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;” and where such perfect remission is vouchsafed, there needs no more sacrifice for sins. For though justified persons continually contract new guilt, and their best services need forgiveness; yet the sacrifice of Christ continually applied to, in the exercise of penitent faith, preserves their peace; and if the exercise of repentance and faith be at any time intermitted, through temptation and sin; corrections, rebukes, and terrors bring them back again to the same remedy: and thus their justification is, as it were, a permanent act of God, continued in their daily pardon and acceptance for Christ’s sake, through life even unto death, and so in judgment and to eternity. Note.—The apostle having closed the argumentative part of his epistle, proceeded to apply his doctrine to practical purposes. As believers had liberty, and “access with boldness,” into the immediate presence of God in the most holy place, and to the mercy-seat, even beyond what was permitted to the high priest himself under the law; it behoved them to make use of this privilege. (Notes, 4:14—16. Eph. 2:14—18. 3:9—12.) For they were in no danger of being punished as presumptuous, notwithstanding their sinfulness and the holiness of God, how often soever they came before him; provided they humbly depended on “the blood of Jesus” for acceptance. They might now have access “into the holiest, by a new way.” The original way of acceptance and communion with God, through “the righteousness of works,” had been finally shut up by the entrance of sin. (Note, Gen. 3:22—24.) The typical sacrifices could not open another way, as the restrictions and exclusions, before stated, evidently showed: while even the admission of the high priest, on the day of atonement only, being preceded with recent sacrifices and blood newly shed, “signified that the way into the holiest was not yet manifested.” But the blood of Jesus is always, as it were, “newly shed;” it never loses its efficacy, and may at any time, and by any sinner, be presented in faith before the mercy-seat; and it never fails to procure, to all who thus plead it, a free and acceptable access to God. This way is also “living;” as Jesus, the High Priest, “ever liveth” to intercede before the throne of God for us, as the Way itself gives life, as it were, to those that come in it, and as it leads to eternal life. (Note, John 14:4—6.) This “new and living way” Christ has consecrated, authorized, and set apart for this purpose, that we may “come to God” in the holiest, upon a mercy-seat, “through the veil, that is, his flesh.” ГЕНОВАН displayed his glory above the mercy-seat, in the holy of holies, before the coming of Christ; but this glory was covered and concealed by the veil; that is, the harmony of infinite holiness with pardoning mercy, in the divine conduct and character, was not clearly discovered or understood. (Notes, 9:1—10. Ex. 26:31—33.) But when the human nature of Christ, the Son of God, was wounded and bruised for our sins; and when he expired on the cross, “the veil was rent from top to bottom.” (Note, Matt. 27:51—53.) The obscurity was then removed, and “a just God and a Saviour” was openly revealed to mankind; displaying his glory from the mercy-seat, and exercising most abundant grace even to the chief of sinners, in a manner most honorable to his infinite purity. Having such “a Way” to God, and “such a High Priest over” the true sanctuary; it was not proper that they, to whom these things were made known, should stand at a distance, as afraid to approach, or averse to the most cordial reconciliation and friendship. The apostle therefore joined himself to those whom he addressed, and called on them to accompany him “in drawing near” to the Lord, with fervent desires, large expectations, and continual prayers and thanksgivings; with sincerity and integrity of heart, as real penitents, and upright worshippers, fearing nothing but hypocrisy; (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2.) and “in full assurance of faith,” most firmly believing, that God would accept the persons and services of all those, who came to him in this appointed manner. (Note, John 1:47—51.) They might indeed very properly examine themselves, whether they were true believers or not; and so admit a doubt of their own sincerity, or personal acceptance; and therefore “the full assurance of hope” could not always be a duty any more than always attainable: yet they must never allow themselves to doubt of the truth of the testimony of God, or his faithfulness to his promises; so that “the full assurance of faith” was always their duty; though in that, as in other things, they would come short of it. (Note, 6:11,12.)—In order to draw near in this manner, they must “have their hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience,” by a special reliance on the atoning blood of Christ, to take away their sense of guilt and fears of wrath, and to give them solid peace; (Notes, 11:28. 12:22—25. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.) connected with the purifying of their consciences from error, ignorance, partiality, and insensibility, or whatever might render them quiet, in the allowance of any kind or degree of sin; and with the cleansing of their hearts from all corrupt and carnal affections. (Notes, 9:11—14. Lev. 14:4—7. Num. 19:5—10. Ps. 51:7. Is. 52:18—15. Ez. 36:25—27.) Their “bodies also must be washed with pure water.” As the priests were washed with water, before they were admitted to enter upon their office, and continually washed themselves, in some measure, before they officiated; and as divers baptisms were appointed to the worshippers by the law; (Notes, 9:8—10. Ex. 29:1—7. 30:18—21.) so the use of water in baptism was to be a constant memorial to Christians, that their outward conduct should be pure and holy before men, as well as their hearts and consciences cleansed in the sight of God. (Notes, Zech. 13:1. Matt. 3:5,6. 28:18—20. John 3:4,5. 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Eph. 5:22—27. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 3:19—22. Rev. 7:13—17.) Thus they would approve themselves to be spiritual worshippers; and, whilst they derived comfort and grace from their reconciled Father, they would “adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things.”

25 Not <sup>z</sup> forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; <sup>a</sup> but exhorting one another; and so much the more, <sup>b</sup> as ye see the day approaching.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle further called on his brethren to unite with him, in “holding fast the profession of their faith” in Christ, “without wavering” in it, faltering about it, or shrinking from the persecutions to which it would expose them: being assured, that God would vouchsafe them those present supports, and the future felicity, which he had promised; and depending on his faithfulness in this respect. (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 10:13. 1 Thes. 5:23—28.) They ought also affectionately to consider one another’s interests, dangers, and situations, and inquire by what means they could be of service to each other: especially they should endeavor, by their example and exhortations, to stimulate one another to the more vigorous and abundant exercise of love, and the zealous practice of good works. Nor ought they, from fear of the reproaches and persecutions of their enemies, or from any prejudices or slothfulness, to forsake the assembling of themselves together, on the Lord’s day, or at other times, to worship God in his ordinances, and to hear his word; as the manner of some was, who, having professed Christianity, were induced, through timidity or lukewarmness, to decline attendance on the public assemblies. On the contrary, they ought to “exhort one another” continually, to be bold, constant, and diligent in their holy religion, in honoring God before his enemies, and in seeking their own and each other’s edification, and establishment in the faith. (Note, 3:7—13.) This they should the more resolutely perform; as they might clearly see the signs of Jerusalem’s approaching desolation, which the Lord Jesus had mentioned in his predictions of that catastrophe, and which was evidently approaching. (Notes, Matt. 24.)—This epistle was written only a few years before that event, and as this would be a critical deliverance of Christians, from the persecutions of the Jews, so it would be peculiarly terrible to apostates.—Faith. (23) Hope is the general and approved reading. (Notes, 3:1—6,14—19. 6:11,12. 1 Pet. 1:13—16.)

26 For <sup>e</sup> if we sin wilfully, <sup>d</sup> after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, <sup>e</sup> there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, 27 But <sup>f</sup> a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and <sup>g</sup> fiery indignation <sup>h</sup> which shall devour the adversaries.

Note.—(Notes, 6:4—8.) The Hebrews would be strongly tempted to apostacy, not only by the virulence of their persecuting countrymen, but by their own undue attachment to the legal sacrifices. So long as they supposed, that the blood of bulls, lambs, or “goats could take away sin,” they would hope for pardon and salvation even in renouncing Christianity, and so, escaping persecution; and thus they might be induced to “sin wilfully, after they had received the knowledge of the truth.” The whole argument shows, that the apostle principally intended a wilful, deliberate, and pertinacious apostacy: not the effect of ignorance or sudden surprise; but against the convictions of their own consciences, and in a presumptuous and obstinate manner: though he expressed himself in such language, as might also warn the readers against every kind of wilful, deliberate, and presumptuous sin. The persons spoken of were such as had “received the knowledge of the truth,” and were so enlightened, in respect of the evidences and doctrines of Christianity, as to make a credible and intelligent profession of it, even in the time of the apostles. When this had preceded, a wilful renunciation of Christianity to return to Judaism, either from a determined purpose of escaping persecution, or from proud and carnal enmity to the humiliating and spiritual truths of the gospel, would generally be fatal. In respect of such apostates, “there remained no more sacrifice for sin.” The legal sacrifices had lost all their validity and efficacy to avert even national judgments, since the death of Christ, which was the Substance of all these shadows: so that the Jewish nation was devoted to speedy destruction, for crucifying their Messiah and rejecting his gospel. Their most exact and zealous attention to the legal expiations could not procure the least respite from their approaching miseries, or any alleviation of them; and the apostates wilfully chose their portion with that devoted generation, “after having received the knowledge of the truth.” Nor could it be expected, that they would ever be “renewed to repentance” of this atrocious and presumptuous wickedness: for they must have witnessed so many miracles, and some of them even have exercised such gifts of the Holy Spirit themselves, that it might be supposed they had committed the blasphemy against that divine Agent, by ascribing his operation to satanical influence; and that they would be given up to final repentance and unbelief, and be wholly excluded from the benefit of Christ's efficacious sacrifice. (Note, Matt. 12:31,32.) So that nothing would “remain” for them, either as individuals, or as a part of the Jewish nation, in respect of their temporal or their eternal state; but “a certain” most terrible expectation of the judgment and vengeance of God; and of his indignation, like flaming fire, to consume them as his implacable enemies, and sacrifices to his offended justice, in the same manner that the fire on the altar consumed the typical sacrifices. (Notes, Gen. 4:3—5. Lev. 1:3,4. 9:24.)—There seems in this awful passage to be a peculiar reference to the unexampled miseries, which came soon after on the Jewish nation, and to their desperate rage and fury in the midst of them. This horror of conscience, connected with desperation and all its tremendous effects, (as in the case of Judas,) might be expected to be most common among apostates from Christianity, who had done violence to their own convictions, and sinned against their better knowledge with presumptuous enmity, when they saw matters evidently coming to those extremities which Christ had predicted. But this horror and despair were only a shadow of the unspeakable anguish, to which they would at length be reduced, when the insulted Saviour should proceed to execute vengeance upon them, from which they would see that it was impossible to escape.—Sometimes apostates have perceived their desperate condition before death, and, in all the horrors and blasphemous rage of damned spirits, have served as beacons to warn others, not to imitate their conduct. Probably, there were few or no instances of such enlightened and deliberate apostates being restored: perhaps several of them had been known to be given up to the most tremendous horrors of conscience; and it was peculiarly proper to state this matter in such strong language, for the benefit of others. (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. 2 Tim. 2:23—26. 4:14,15. 2 Pet. 2:20—22. 1 John 5:16—18.) Yet this did not imply, that any penitent would fail of obtaining mercy; or that any one would be excluded from the benefit of the Saviour's sacrifice, who humbly, earnestly, and perseveringly sought it; into whatever sins he had been betrayed. The persons spoken of are considered as “adversaries,” which cannot properly be applied to the case of any trembling, weeping, praying penitent. It was not probable, that such apostates, as were described, would, in the peculiar circumstances of those times, return to seek forgiveness by faith in the blood of Christ; and their danger consisted in being given up to final obduracy, or desperation. The passage, therefore, can have nothing to do with the case of persons, called Christians, in these days, who had not previously received the knowledge either of the evidences or doctrines of Christianity; but who, through ignorance, or the artifices of wicked men, have been led to doubt or deny the truth of the scriptures, without any of the peculiar aggravations of these primitive apostates. Some of these persons, being afterwards "renewed to repentance," have assuredly believed the gospel, experienced the power of its truth in their hearts, and produced the fruits of it in their lives: yet Satan has taken advantage of the sound of this and similar passages, and of some unguarded things which expositors or preachers have said on the subject, to harass them with perpetual apprehensions, that there remained no benefit for them in the sacrifice of Christ, because they once doubted the truth of Christianity; though they now value that salvation more than all the world.—Cases of this kind have fallen under the writer's cognizance: and in this day of skepticism and infidelity, in which multitudes aspire to the reputation of free thinkers, by never thinking seriously at all, there may be many of the same kind. For when Satan can no longer buoy up men in unbelieving presumption, he endeavors to drive them into unbelieving desperation; and he never fails to harass those to the utmost, whose destruction he cannot compass. Even when the gospel has been renounced, after far clearer knowledge, and with much greater malignity, than in the case before stated, the apostacy cannot be fatal unless it be final. It is the peculiar honor of the mercy of God, and of the redemption of Christ, that none are excluded, who are willing to accept of them in the prescribed manner: "Him that cometh unto Christ, he will in no wise cast out," whatever he has before been guilty of: (Note, John 6:36—40.) but when professed Christians are tempted to apostacy, they may well fear, lest God should be provoked to give them up to final obduracy, and a reprobate mind; and then, while living on earth, their doom is as irreversibly fixed as that of devils or damned spirits.—"The apostle lays it down as 'certain, that God will not pardon sinners, without some sacrifice or satisfaction. For otherwise, it would not follow, from there remaining 'to apostates no other sacrifice for sin, that 'there must remain to them a dreadful expectation of judgment.' Macknight.—The knowledge of the truth. (26) He does not say "The love of the truth."

29 Of <sup>m</sup> how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath <sup>n</sup> trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted <sup>o</sup> the blood of the covenant, <sup>p</sup> wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, <sup>q</sup> and hath done despite unto <sup>r</sup> the Spirit of grace?

30 For we know him that hath said, <sup>s</sup> Vengeance belongeth unto me; I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, <sup>t</sup> The Lord shall judge his people.

31 It is <sup>x</sup> a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

Note.—The sacrifices of the law were principally appointed for "sins of ignorance," infirmity, or inadvertency; but presumptuous transgressors were excluded from that benefit. (Notes, Lev. 4:5:6:1—7. Num. 15:22—31. 1 Sam. 2:23—25, 29. 3:14. Ps. 19:12—14. 51:16.) "He," therefore, "who despised the law of Moses," and deliberately violated its plain commands, in contempt and defiance of the authority and vengeance of God, was punishable with death, and excluded from mercy, when the fact had been legally proved; even though the crime were such, as might otherwise have been pardoned through a trespass-offering. (Notes, 2:1—4. 12:15—17, 22—25. Num. 15:32—36. Matt. 3:7—10.) But "of how much severer" vengeance would they be adjudged deserving, who renounced the gospel, in that wilful, contemptuous, and presumptuous manner, which had been described! They had indeed, as it were, "trampled upon the Son of God," with insolent defiance and disdain, by doing all in their power to dishonor him, and to provoke him, with the most desperate ingratitude and impiety: they had esteemed the precious "blood of the new covenant," by the shedding of which Christ "had been sanctified," or consecrated, to be the High Priest and Advocate of sinners in the heavenly sanctuary, as if it had been an unclean thing, less holy than the blood of goats, or as vile as that of a malefactor! (Notes, 5:7—10. 13:20, 21.) Some indeed apply the word sanctified to the apostate; who had been admitted into the church, as set apart for God, and consecrated to his service, by professing faith in the blood of Christ, which he afterwards vilified.—In either case, it may refer to those blasphemies, against "Jesus of Nazareth," which were often required of such as renounced the gospel, in order to avoid death, or other sufferings; and which apostates would commonly use, in order to gain confidence with the party which they had joined.—They had moreover "done despite to the Holy Spirit," the divine and gracious Author of spiritual life, and all holy consolations in the souls of sinners. They had acted in direct opposition to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and to his strivings with them. In renouncing Christianity, they traduced, with most virulent reproaches, that religion, which was adorned by

lous power to divination and satanical agency, even contrary to their own knowledge: thus they acted as if they were determined to provoke him in the most despiteful manner possible. (Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. Luke 12:8-10.) So that, the authority and mercy of the Father, the Person, love, and atoning blood of the Son, and the Person and operations of the Holy Spirit, were alike insulted and blasphemed by them, after having professed the gospel, and having been baptized "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!" yea, many of them at least, after having received the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles! and what punishment could be too severe for such accumulated guilt! Nor ought any man, when tempted to so atrocious a crime, to flatter himself with hopes of impunity, from the immensity of the divine mercy; seeing God had declared that "vengeance belonged to him" as his peculiar prerogative; and that he would "judge his people," being determined to punish with most decided severity, the crimes of such as renounced his worship, or committed and continued in wickedness to the disgrace of their profession. (Notes, Deut. 32:34-43. Rom. 12:17-21.) It would indeed be found, and might be known, to be a "terrible thing," beyond all expression or imagination, to "fall into the hands of the living," the eternal, the almighty God, as sacrifices to his justice, and objects of his vengeance and abhorrence; without any oblation, or any Mediator, to appease his indignation. (Note, 2 Sam. 24:12-14.) This was about to be the case of the Jewish nation; and it would peculiarly be the doom of wilful and malignant apostates from Christianity.—The 'epithet, of living, is given to God, in this passage, where his vengeance is spoken of, to 'show, that as he lives for ever he can punish for ever; a consideration which adds to the 'terribleness of his vengeance.' Macknight.

Note.—The apostle here proceeded to warn and exhort the Hebrews, by other topics. To fortify their minds against temptations to apostacy, or to other wilful and presumptuous sins, they ought frequently to recollect the former days of their profession; and to consider what they had already ventured, suffered, and renounced for Christ, and how they had been supported and comforted under their trials. When they were first "illuminated" in the knowledge of the gospel, (Notes, 6:4-6. 2 Cor. 4:3-6.) and had been admitted into the Christian church; they were speedily called, as soldiers to the combat, to contend with persecutions and afflictions. Some of them were made a public spectacle to their neighbors, by the malicious accusations brought against them, and by the disgrace, derision, and punishment laid upon them: others were the "companions" or partners, of those who were thus cruelly entreated; and thus were called to join sympathy with their afflicted brethren, to alarms on their own account. Among those, whom the apostle especially addressed, were several that had "shown compassion to him" some years before, when he was bound at Jerusalem, and in his subsequent imprisonment: and when, on that or other accounts, their property was seized and confiscated, they bore it, not only patiently, but "joyfully;" having abundant consolation from the assurance that they had "in heaven a better and more enduring inheritance," which could not be taken from them, but would be their substantial felicity for ever. For they possessed in themselves, independently of all external things, the pledges and earnest of that expected blessing.

39 But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul.

Note.—Let then none of those, who had acted hitherto in so honorable and consistent a manner, at length “cast away their confidence” in Christ, or renounce the profession of his name, which they had boldly made; and to which a most gracious and abundant recompense was promised. Some, indeed, who once seemed to be zealous believers, had apostatized, and the rest would surely be tried greatly. They had therefore need to have their minds armed with patient resignation and persevering constancy: that, “having done the will of God,” by steadfastly cleaving to Christ, and obeying him, through all temptations and sufferings, they might afterwards receive the promised gift of eternal life. For in regard to their final deliverance from trouble, as well as to the coming of Christ to take vengeance on the Jewish nation, and thus to deliver the Christian church from the persecutions, which they endured from that quarter, the words of God by the prophet might properly be applied: “The just by faith would live.” (Notes, Hab. 2:1—4.) Thus it had been predicted: but proud unbelievers would be cut off and perish. If therefore any man, who had made the most plausible profession of faith in Christ, should draw back in the time of trial, and finally apostatize; the Lord declared, by his apostle, according to the tenor of his whole word, and speaking after the manner of men, that “his soul should have no pleasure in him;” that is, he would utterly reject and entirely abhor him. Many of the Hebrews had thus evidenced the insincerity of their profession by apostacy; and others began to “forsake the assembling of themselves together,” who needed to be reproved and warned: but the apostle trusted that he himself, and they whom he immediately addressed, were not of the same character with those “who drew back to perdition, but of them that believed to the saving of their souls;” even such as were partakers of living faith, and would be “kept through it by the power of God unto salvation.”—The just, &c. (38) “The just man,” (the word is singular here, in the Septuagint, and in the Hebrew.) “by faith shall live: but if he draw back, &c.”—The insertion of the words, “any man,” has been justly objected to; for, if the just man himself draw back, and continue in apostacy, he shall finally perish; and we must not alter the scriptures, to support our own view of evangelical truth. (Notes, Ez. 3:20,21.)—In the Septuagint, however, whence the quotation is made, the clauses are reversed: “if he draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him: but the just by the faith of me, shall live.” And here, “the just by faith, who shall live,” is clearly distinguished, as another character, from him, who “drew back to perdition,” in the concluding verse. The Septuagint seems to have read the Hebrew very differently from our copies; but the meaning of each is important.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

So precious are the blessings, which come to us through the gospel, that all “sacrifices” and ordinances, however varied and multiplied, could only be an indistinct shadow, and not so much as an exact image of them: and, in like manner, the most nervous language, the most lively expressions, and the most fervent affections, fall immensely beneath their real excellency. The righteousness brought in by Christ, and the sacrifice once offered by him, are of infinite and eternal efficacy, and “his salvation shall never be abolished.” They suffice to make all “the comers thereunto perfect:” “the worshippers, once purged” by his atoning blood, need seek no other sacrifice; nor will they, by the consciousness of guilt, be ever driven to adopt such expedients, as “call sin to remembrance,” yet cannot possibly take it away. But daily applying to the great propitiation, they derive from it both strength, and motives for obedience, and inward comfort, notwithstanding their remaining sinfulness.—Most certain it is from these chapters, that God will not pardon any transgression, without such a sacrifice, as can really expiate the guilt of it. And if those sacrifices, which were of his own appointment, “could not take away sin,” because they could not satisfy the demands of his justice; let none suppose, that human inventions, self-imposed penances, prayers, tears, amendments, moral virtues, alms-deeds, or any other device or performance, can avail in the behalf of those, who substitute them in the stead of the sacrifice of the Son of God: “for if righteousness,” in any way or degree, “come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.” (Notes, Is. 40:12—17. Mic. 6:6—8. Gal. 2: 17—21.)

V. 5—18.

When the eternal Son of God saw the hopeless condition of fallen man, for whom no sacrifices even of divine appointment, and no contrivances of man’s devising, could in the least avail; he, according as it had been written of him in “the volume of the book” from the beginning, with infinite compassion towards our deserved misery, came in human nature, to accomplish the will of the Father, and to “bear our sins in his own body on the tree.” (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) Thus, “by one sacrifice for sins” he effected the glorious and gracious design; and now, seated on the right hand of God, he henceforth “expects till all his enemies shall be put under his feet.” What then remains, but that we seek an interest in this sacrifice by faith, and the seal of it to our souls by “the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience?” Thus, by “the law being written in our hearts,” we may know that we are perfectly justified, and that God will no more remember any of our sins and iniquities.—“Lord, have mercy upon us; and write all thy laws in our hearts, we beseech thee.”

est by the blood of Jesus," by "the new and living way which he hath consecrated for us," through the rending of the veil by his crucifixion for our sins; and "having such a High Priest over the house of God;" let us not stand at a distance, or turn away from him who "beseeches us to be reconciled." (Notes, Is. 55:6, 7. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Jam. 4:7—10.) Let us in the first place, beware of hypocrisy, that we may "draw near with a true heart;" let us watch and pray against unbelief, that we may come "in the full assurance of faith," knowing this to be the appointed and only way of acceptance and salvation: let us apply his blood to purge us from guilt, and seek for his promised grace, to cleanse us from all our filthiness; that so, our "hearts being sprinkled from an evil conscience," we may "lay aside the body of the sins of the flesh," and "henceforth walk in newness of life." Thus we shall be enabled to "hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering," whatever temptations or seducing examples we may meet with; knowing that "he is faithful who hath promised:" and, with composed and cheerful minds, we shall be enabled to consider the cases of our brethren, that we may animate and "stimulate them to love and good works."—But, if they were not to be excused who, in the time of severe persecution, forsook the assembling of themselves together; how shall we answer it to God, if in these favored days, we indolently absent ourselves from the assemblies of his saints, and neglect to honor him by attendance on his ordinances? Against such evils we should warn others most earnestly; and we ought ourselves gladly "to suffer the word of exhortation," as knowing that the day of death and of judgment speedily approaches.

By negligence, pride, or carnal self-love, or by gradually yielding to the fear of man, many professors of the gospel are left to "sin wilfully after they have received the knowledge of the truth;" and, though the fallen, the weak, and the trembling should be encouraged; yet we cannot too awfully alarm the secure, self-confident, and presumptuous: as every deliberate sin, against light and conscience, is a step towards the tremendous precipice described by the apostle. Neither the mercy of God, nor the sacrifice of Christ, nor the love of the Spirit, will profit that man, "who tramples under foot the Son of God," treats his atoning blood with insolent contempt, "and does despite to the Spirit of grace." For daring rebels and apostates of this description, "there remains no more" or other "sacrifice for sin; but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, to consume" them as the enemies of the Lord. "To him belongeth vengeance;" and his righteous recompenses on the crimes committed by hypocrites and apostates, will be more terrible than the doom of Sodom, or than that executed upon the devoted Jews. However men may now despise these warnings, they will at length know, that it is "a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God;" and to hear him say, "It is a people, that hath no understanding; therefore he who made them will have no mercy on them." (Note, Is. 27:7—11.) Let then every professed Christian "give diligence to make his calling and election sure;" let us all remember our convictions, affections, and purposes, when we were first "enlightened;" and how we thought, that we should be willing to endure or part with any thing, if we could but obtain peace with God and a good hope of salvation: and let us also remember our consolations and supports under former trials. If we have been called to "endure a great fight of afflictions," and have suffered reproaches and losses with fortitude and cheerfulness, from a persuasion that we had "in heaven a better and a more enduring substance;" let us not disgrace our former conduct, or "cast away our confidence, which hath great recompense of reward." For we still "have need of patience" and perseverance, whilst we wait the accomplishment of God's promises, in obedience to his will. But "the time is short:" he that cometh will soon come, and will not tarry beyond his appointed season; and he will shortly end our sorrows and conflicts, by removing our souls to heaven: yea, he will speedily come to raise the dead, and perfect our salvation. Let us then show that we are justified through faith, by living and "walking with God" in dependence upon his promises, and in obedience to his commands, because we are satisfied with the security of his word. Thus we shall possess the assurance, that "we are not of them who draw back to perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

CHAP. XI.

The nature, excellency, efficacy, and fruits of faith, illustrated by the examples of the most eminent saints, from Abel to the close of the Old Testament dispensation, 1—38. The superior advantages of Christianity, 39, 40.

Note.—The apostle, having referred to the prophet's testimony, that "the just by faith shall live," (Note, 10:35—39.) proceeded more fully to show the nature and efficacy of faith; and to prove, by scriptural examples, that it had always been the grand distinguishing peculiarity of JEHOVAH's worshippers, from the beginning of the world. This induction of examples he prefaced by a definition of faith; in which he did not confine his views to one single exercise of that fundamental grace, but took in all the variety of its actings, in the whole of a believer's experience and conduct. Where the principle, from which faith springs, is implanted by the regenerating Spirit of God, it leads a man to receive the truth, concerning justification by the merits of Jesus Christ, according to the measure of light afforded him; (Note, John 1:10—13.) but it will also embrace the whole word of God, and expect its accomplishment, to all the extent, in which he has spoken and promised. (2 Thes. 2:13.) This divine faith is "the substance of things hoped for." Crediting "the sure testimony of God," resting on his promises, and expecting the accomplishment of them, it gives the object hoped for at some future period, a present subsistence in the soul, as if already possessed; for the believer is satisfied with the security afforded, and acts under the full persuasion that God will not fail of his engagements. Thus the believer gives up present advantages, and endures present hardships, in obedience to God, and in waiting for his promise: even as men give ready money for an estate in reversion; or endure present labor, in hope of future ease and indulgence. (Notes, 6:16—20. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:24—27. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 1 John 5:1—3.)—But faith has not only respect to the good things hoped for: it is also, “the evidence of things not seen.” The things revealed to faith, but invisible to sense, and undiscoverable by reason, may relate to the past, the present, or the future; to God, and to his works of creation, providence, and redemption; to his omniscient presence and his future judgment; to the world of spirits, and the eternal state of happiness or misery; to the law and its sanctions, or the gospel and its privileges; and, in short, to a great variety of particulars which cannot be enumerated. But faith is the evidence, the internal conviction, or demonstration, of them all. To unbelievers those appear false, dubious, or visionary; for they have no medium, by which to obtain satisfaction about them: but believers take the clear “testimony of God,” as a truth already demonstrated, which requires no further proof: their argument is this; “God hath said it, and it must be true.” In proportion to the strength of this faith, their judgment and conduct are influenced by this realizing conviction, with reference to things revealed; even as if they were the objects of sight, or capable of strict demonstration. The believer uses his powers of reasoning, to obtain satisfaction concerning the evidence, that such or such matters are divinely revealed; and to determine the meaning of the words, in which the revelation is conveyed. (Note, 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) But, when these previous questions are answered, he most rationally says, ‘God has determined this point: and though I once thought otherwise, as multitudes still do; yet infinite knowledge and truth have decided against our prejudices and erroneous opinions, and I submit to the divine teaching.’ He is not so absurd, as to attempt to invalidate the testimony of God by his objections, or even to give force to it by his arguments. (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.) He does not suppose that divine revelation must be level to man’s comprehension, or coincide with his speculations: he expects, believes, and adores mysteries; but knows that contradiction is not mystery: so that mysteries above reason he humbly receives, but absurdities contrary to it, he ascribes to misconstruction or imposture. (Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. Matt. 13:10,11. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—This description of faith will be illustrated by all the examples in this chapter.—The apostle further observed, that by faith all the pious progenitors of Israel, and other eminent persons in former times, had “obtained a good report,” or an honorable character in the word of God. By faith they were justified; and the same was the principle of all their holy obedience and eminent services, and patient constant sufferings in the cause of truth and holiness.—There is no operation of the human soul, which can possibly receive and profit by testimony, except faith, or believing. Revelation without faith is and must be as useless, as light without vision. (Note, Acts 26:16—18.)

3 Through <sup>f</sup> faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear.

Note.—The heavens and the earth, and all things in them, as well as the regular order with which they are governed and directed, might, indeed, be proved by argument to be the contrivance and work of God: (Note, Rom. 1:18—20.) yet men’s reason had never come to any satisfactory and practical conclusions in this matter. (Note, Gen. 4:1.) So that “by faith,” crediting the word of God, we believe, and understand to good purpose, that “the worlds” were contrived, framed, created, and arranged in their present order, by the omnipotent command of God: and that the things, which we now behold in such resplendent beauty, were made of those things, “which do not now appear.” They were produced from the chaotic mass, which “was without form and void,” by that powerful word, which first called the chaos out of non-existence. (Note, Gen. 1:2.) This was effected in the six days’ work of creation: and the satisfactory assurance, which believers derive from the scriptural account of the original of the world, being contrasted with the discordant hypotheses and endless disputations of ancient philosophers and modern theorists, exhibits a very striking illustration of the proposition, that “faith is the evidence,” or demonstration, “of things not seen.” (Note, 1,2. Gen. 1:2.)—‘This world, which we see, was not made of any appearing or existing matter, but from nothing; contrary to the axiom of all the philosophers, ‘From nothing, nothing is made.’ This indeed never could enter into the mind of any philosophers, not even of those who wrote that ‘God created the world. Therefore the whole of this is of faith.’’—a.—Nothing can possibly be more unphilosophical, or indeed absurd, than the notion of the eternal pre-existence of that Chaos, from which God created the world: yet, I apprehend, Beza had firm grounds for asserting, that none of the philosophers had perceived this, or without revelation would have perceived it. Most commentators consider this verse as a decided proof, that God created the world from nothing; which no doubt is the doctrine both of reason and revelation.

4 By <sup>s</sup> faith Abel offered unto God <sup>h</sup> a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which <sup>i</sup> he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: <sup>k</sup> and by it he being dead * yet speaketh.

Note.—The original word rendered “more excellent,” signifies also a “greater,” fuller, or more complete sacrifice. Cain brought the meat-offering alone: Abel, as it is generally supposed, brought that, and also “the firstlings of his flock.” “By faith,” embracing the promise of a Redeemer who was to come, Abel, as a sinner, penitently, humbly, uprightly, and obediently, presented unto God the typical sacrifice, which had been appointed; and he was accepted: but Cain in self-wisdom, self-righteousness, impenitence, unbelief, brought a formal acknowledgment to God of his obligations to him for temporal benefits, but not a sacrifice as the atonement for his sins. He seemed to say, with modern infidels and skeptics; ‘In what is my sacrifice inferior to Abel’s? Why should he be so bigoted, as to think God will accept none, who do not come in his peculiar way? I, being sincere, shall be as favorably received with my sacrifice, as he with his: and indeed it seems more rational to present the first fruits of the earth, than to slay an innocent lamb, to be burned upon the altar.’ (Note, Gen. 4:3—5.) Yet God rejected his offering: and his rage and enmity against Abel, the accepted worshipper of God, produced the same horrid effects, which similar principles have in every age been producing, in cruel persecutions and multiplied murders of believers, especially by formalists and hypocrites. (Notes, Gen. 4:6—15. 1 John 3:11—15.) But God himself attested, that Abel “was righteous” before him, and that his oblations were accepted: so that, being murdered by Cain, he “still speaketh” to us; declaring that sin cannot be pardoned without an atonement, that sinners can come to God, only by penitent faith in the great Propitiation; that faith is uniformly connected with righteousness and upright obedience; that believers have their portion in a better world, and not on earth; that they must expect no favor from proud self-righteous unbelievers; and that their blood, shed by persecutors, calls from the ground to heaven for vengeance. (Notes, 12: 20—25. Matt. 23:34—36.)—Abel offered a ‘sin-offering, as well as a meat-offering. ... ‘Whereas Cain, having no sense of sin, thought himself obliged to offer nothing but a ‘meat-offering. ... In this character of Abel, ‘Paul had our Lord’s expression in his eye, “the blood of righteous Abel.” (Matt. 23:35.) —As in after times God testified his acceptance of particular sacrifices, by sending down fire upon them; ... we may suppose it was in ‘that manner, that he testified Abel’s righteousness upon his offering. ... Flesh not being permitted to men till after the flood, Abel must ‘have thought it unlawful to kill any animal, ‘unless God had ordered it to be killed as a sacrifice. Macknight.

6 But <sup>q</sup> without faith it is impossible to please him: for <sup>r</sup> he that cometh to God <sup>s</sup> must believe that he is, and that he is <sup>t</sup> a rewarder of them that <sup>u</sup> diligently seek him.

Note.—(Notes, Gen. 5:21—24. Jude 14—16.) By faith, Enoch was so peculiarly favored of God, that he was “translated” to heaven, without seeing death, or experiencing its painful stroke; (Luke 2:26. Notes, John 8:48—53. 2 Cor. 5:1—4.) his body having been changed and rendered incorruptible, that he might immediately enter on his full felicity. So that he was not found on earth, by those who sought him, as the sons of the prophet sought Elijah; for the Lord had taken him to himself. (Note, 2 Kings 2:11—18.) But, before this took place, he had received some evident testimony, that God was pleased with him, and, probably, this was made known to his contemporaries.—Enoch “walked with God” for a long season; and this was the effect of that faith by which he pleased him: for it is, and always was, “impossible” for fallen man “to please God,” except by faith; seeing every one, who “cometh to God” to worship and serve him, (Note, 7: 23—25.) “must believe that he is.” The accepted worshipper must realize his invisible being, presence, and perfections; which can only be done by faith, receiving the Revelation which he has given of himself; otherwise some imaginary deity, some idol, will be substituted in his place. Moreover, he must believe “that God is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek him:” but, as all men deserve condemnation for their sins, and even their best services need forgiveness; no one can know, or on good grounds conclude, that God will reward his services, or accept him in them; unless by receiving the testimony of revelation, either immediate, traditional, or written. This Enoch doubtless did; and so he believed in God, and came to him, by faith in his word and promise, according to his appointment; and thus was accepted and graciously rewarded. But this differs widely from a mere assent to a conjecture, or a conclusion of reason, concerning the existence of a God, without any just notions of his perfections, will, or worship; and an attempt to please him, in ways of man’s devising. This many suppose to be all “the faith,” which the apostle here means: though it does not at all resemble the religion of any one person men-

Faith must have respect to some word spoken, which it believes: but the conjectures, or deductions from reasoning, in a man's own mind, cannot be faith, according to the common use of words; much less can such a meaning of faith be found in scripture. It is "the belief of the truth," of "the word" and "testimony of God." —He pleased God. (5) St. Paul here quotes the Septuagint, where the words, translated in our version, "he walked with God," are twice rendered "he pleased God:" as the same Hebrew term is rendered, in other places. 7 By faith <sup>x</sup> Noah, being <sup>y</sup> warned of God of <sup>z</sup> things not seen as yet, * moved with fear, <sup>a</sup> prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which <sup>b</sup> he condemned the world, and became heir of the <sup>c</sup> righteousness which is by faith.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, Gen. 6:9:) The Lord, by immediate revelation, made known to Noah his purpose of destroying the inhabitants of the whole earth by a flood of water, and "warned him" to prepare for that event. These "things not seen as yet:" nothing of that kind had ever happened: no token of such a deluge appeared: unbelief might conclude it impossible; or exclaim against it, as inconsistent with the justice or goodness of God. But Noah had faith, which was in him "a demonstration of things not seen:" he verily believed the word which God had spoken, and that such a deluge would come; he confidently expected that Omnipotence would execute the sentence denounced by infinite justice, and fulfil the word of un-failing veracity: he therefore revered with holy awe the majesty of God, and was moved with fear of falling under his displeasure: he was aware that unbelief and disobedience would expose him to future vengeance, as well as involve him in the common calamity; and therefore, he was prepared to employ any means of deliverance, which the Lord should see good to appoint. Accordingly, when directed and commanded to prepare an ark, he did not hesitate to obey in the most entire and unreserved manner: though the labor and expense of building so large a vessel, must have been enormous; and though the undertaking must have exposed him to all kinds of ridicule and obloquy, as he might be sure that the unbelieving world would deride him as a visionary and a fanatic, for so singular a conduct. But "he obeyed in faith:" he ventured all consequences, and exercised the needful self-denial: he waited the Lord's time; and preached, though unsuccessfully, to the men of his generation. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:19,20. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) He expected safety in the ark, though Omnipotence alone could secure him, in a vessel constructed as it was, through so tremendous a deluge. Thus he was preserved, and he preserved his family also, from the common destruction of mankind, to re-people the earth; his example and admonitions concurred in "condemning the world," and in showing the justice of God in thus punishing their universal and incorrigible wickedness. (Notes, Is. 54:6—10, 15—17. Ez. 14:13—21. Matt. 12:41,42. Rom. 2:25—29.) By the same faith, he relied on the promise of God concerning the Messiah, and became "heir of the righteousness of faith," and of eternal salvation through him. This may be shown to be an exact representation of the manner, in which believers, being warned by God to "flee from the wrath to come," are "moved with fear," take refuge in Christ, part with all for his sake, are often made the instruments of salvation to their families also, "condemn the world, and become heirs of the righteousness of faith." (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Phil. 3:8—11.)—A Jewish writer introduces Noah, from the ark, expostulating with those who were perishing, because excluded. They plead, that they had used various means of securing themselves, in case the deluge should come, though they had declined his invitation to come into the ark: but he silences all their pleas at once, by saying, that they had refused to avail themselves of God's appointed way of preservation; and every other method must be unavailing. "How shall ye escape, if ye neglect so great salvation?" (Note, 2:1—4. Matt 24:36—41.)

the old world, and to the progenitor of the new world, and even superior to them in eminence, was Abraham the chosen father of Israel, of many nations, of the Messiah, and spiritually of all believers. When he was first selected to be the repository of the promises, "he was called," and commanded, to leave his native country and all its attachments; and to go out into a place, which he was "afterwards to receive for an inheritance," that is, in his posterity. This command was connected with several promises to him and to his seed; by faith he substantiated the blessings hoped for, and was satisfied concerning "the things not seen;" he therefore implicitly obeyed the call of God, and "went forth," not knowing whither he was about to travel. But he was satisfied, that he was following the special guidance of God, under his immediate protection; and he therefore disregarded the objections, persuasions, or contempt of those, to whom such a design must have appeared to the last degree visionary and irrational.—By faith in the promise of JEHOVAH, he continued likewise to sojourn as a stranger in that land, which was promised to his posterity, without having any inheritance in it, or even building a house there: but passing his days as a traveller, dwelling in tents, which were easily removed, shifting frequently from one place to another; yet within the land of Canaan, except as he was forced out of it by famine. Thus he spent his life, even after the birth of Isaac, and afterwards of Jacob; who were "the heirs with him of the same promises," and who imitated his example in this manner of life, and in believing obedience to the commandment of God. For he was not desirous of a city in Canaan, or elsewhere: because he expected one of a more excellent nature, which alone has foundations that can never be removed; even the permanent, secure, and blessed city of God, where he displays his glory, and communicates unalloyed felicity; of which He is the Architect. His wisdom and love formed the stupendous plan, and his omnipotence executed it, for the glory of his own name, and the eternal residence of those whom he delights to honor and bless: and what can those magnificent cities be, which proud mortals have erected; compared with that, "the Builder and Maker of" which is the almighty and everlasting God? Abraham expected Canaan for his posterity, and a mansion in heaven for himself.—If this was the faith of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and this their expectation; can we suppose that such of their posterity, as "obtained a good report by faith," did not believe the same truths, and expect the same inheritance? Nay, can we reasonably doubt, whether this was the popular creed, and hope of Israel, through successive generations, to the time of Christ? We cannot: unless we can suppose, that the Sinai-covenant, in which national advantages were secured to Israel, on condition of national obedience, could operate, as the fabled waters of Lethe, to make them entirely forget all preceding revelations made to their forefathers, and transmitted to them; and all the obedient confidence, which their forefathers had placed in those revelations. In fact, there is not one age, in the history of Israel, from the origin of the nation, to the termination of the New Testament, of which we have any remaining records; but in these records, the belief of a future state of just tribulations, a future judgment, and a state of supreme blessedness to the righteous, may not be clearly discerned, and pointed out. 11 Through faith also <sup>m</sup> Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, <sup>n</sup> because she judged him faithful who had promised.

12 Therefore sprang there even of one, <sup>o</sup> and him as good as dead, so many <sup>p</sup> as the stars of the sky in multitude, and <sup>q</sup> as the sand which is by the sea-shore innumerable.

Note.—Sarah was at first unbelieving, when a son was promised to her in her old age; but she afterwards was enabled to rely on the faithfulness and power of God, to perform his word, though contrary to the ordinary course of nature; and, in consequence of this faith, she was supernaturally strengthened to conceive and bear a son. Thus, in answer to the expectation of the faith, both of Abraham and Sarah, there sprang from one father, (who apparently was in this respect even as a dead person, from whom no offspring could have been expected,) such an immense multitude, that they were as "the stars of heaven," or even absolutely innumerable, as the sands on the sea-shore.—This principally refers to the descendants of Abraham by Isaac and Jacob; but those descended from him by Ishmael, and the sons of Keturah, and from Isaac by Esau, render the fulfilment of the promises to him, in this respect, still more surprising. (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. 15:5,6. 17:15—21. 18:9—15. 21:1—7. 22:16—18. 25:1—4. 36: Is. 51:1—3. Ez. 33:24—29. Rom. 4:18—22.) out, they might have had opportunity to have returned.

Note.—Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Jacob, persevered in faith, and “the obedience of faith,” even unto death, and departed, expecting the performance of God’s promises to them and their posterity. (Notes, Gen. 48: 49:.) For they had not “received the promises,” or the things promised; either the inheritance of Canaan, or the coming of the promised Seed, during their lives. (Note, 39,40.) They had endured many hardships and trials, without any such peculiar advantages, as might answer to the singular favor, which the Lord declared that he bare to them. But they had “seen the promised blessings afar off, and were persuaded,” that they would be performed in due season; they “embraced them” by faith, as their portion, and the inheritance of their posterity; and they gave up present advantages for the sake of them, “confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims upon earth.” (Marg. Ref. x.—Notes, Gen. 23:3,4. 47:9. 49:18.) Now those who considered themselves, during their whole abode in this world, to be strangers in a foreign land, and travellers through it, plainly declared that they were going home to their native country, the residence of their Father and their most beloved friends, and the place of their permanent abode and enjoyment. Indeed, if weary of this wandering life, they had purposed to return into Mesopotamia, they might have found an opportunity of doing it, and might there have settled among their relations; but this would have been an act of unbelief and disobedience, and a renunciation of the promises. Whereas, by sojourning in a strange land unto death, they declared their supreme desire and hope of a better country, than could be found on earth, even of that heavenly inheritance, which Canaan typified. As, therefore, they were willing to renounce all other prospects, to follow God in obedient faith, for the sake of an eternal and invisible inheritance; and, as he had prepared such an inheritance, or permanent, glorious city, for them; (Note, 8—10.) so “he was not ashamed,” or did not disdain, “to be called their God,” their Friend, and their everlasting Portion. Whereas the advantages, which they had on earth from their believing dependence on him, were too transient and little, to answer to so high a relation; seeing these were neither sufficient for their final felicity, nor for the glory of his divine munificence. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, Gen. 22:1—19. P. O.) It was peculiarly to be noted, that in the grand instance, in which Abraham had been tried and proved, how far he would carry his unreserved obedience to the Lord, he had been influenced by the same powerful principle of “faith:” even when, in his determined purpose, he had offered up his beloved Isaac as a burnt-offering, in whom God himself had, as it were, laid up the promises: so that he might have thought he was about to render the performance of them impossible, by obeying this hard and mysterious command. But he left this difficulty with God, assured that he was able to restore his son to life, from the ashes to which he was about to reduce his body; though no instance of a resurrection from the dead had hitherto occurred. And in fact he did receive him back, as from the dead; seeing he had for three days lain under the sentence of death.—This, in a most expressive figure, represented the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ, “the Only begotten of the Father,” thus delivered for us lost sinners, to bleed and die, and bear the wrath of God for us, by “love which passeth knowledge.”—Some indeed explain the last clause, of Isaac’s supernatural conception and birth, which, by a figurative manner of speaking, might be called receiving him from the dead: but the other interpretation is far preferable. 20 By <sup>n</sup> faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come.

Note.—Isaac, as well as Rebekah and Jacob, was highly reprehensible, in the circumstances of the transaction, which is here referred to; (Notes, Gen. 25:22,23. 27:1—29.) yet he blessed his two sons, in a firm belief that God would fulfil the promises to his posterity. He also spake by the spirit of prophecy; and he most entirely believed, and acquiesced in the discoveries made of the future condition of the posterity of both Jacob and Esau, though his own purposes were thus disannulled. In a firm belief and assured persuasion, that the promises made to Abraham and to himself would be accomplished, (though under an error, the effect of a criminal partiality for Esau, he mistook the heir of these promises,) he blessed Jacob, supposing that it was Esau: but, subsequent events convincing him of his mistake, he confirmed the blessing pronounced on Jacob, which he afterwards more deliberately ratified; (Notes, Gen. 25:22,23. 28:3,4.) and he also foretold many important particulars, concerning Esau and his descendants. (Notes, Gen. 27:39,40.)

Note.—Jacob, when his death approached, pronounced a prophetic blessing on each of his twelve sons; but that which respected Ephraim and Manasseh is here especially noted. (Notes, Gen. 47:29—31. 48.) God revealed to him his future purpose concerning their posterity, and, in a firm belief of his word, Jacob “blessed them:” and, though weak and infirm, he expressed his confidence in God, and his gratitude to him, by worshipping him, “leaning on the top of his staff.” Thus the Septuagint render the words which, in our version, are translated “the bed’s head;” and the variation is immaterial. The same word, by changing merely the vowel points, will bear either signification.—“We have here a lively example of ‘that substance, (Note, I.) which was before commemorated. Jacob, dying a stranger in ‘Egypt, distributes the kingdoms of the Canaanites to his twelve sons, in no other manner, ‘than he would have done, had he reigned in ‘peace at Jerusalem. But how true and solid ‘this “faith, the substance of things hoped for,” ‘was, appeared by this, that after many years, ‘the whole concern being committed to the lot, ‘than which nothing seems more fortuitous, the ‘event confirmed Jacob’s testament.’ Beza.—This learned divine here includes the blessing, which Jacob pronounced on all his sons, as well as that on Joseph, with Manasseh and Ephraim. (Notes, Gen. 49:)

22 By <sup>q</sup> faith Joseph, when he died, * made mention of the departing of the children of Israel: and gave commandment concerning his bones.

Note.—(Notes, Gen. 50:24—26. Acts 7:15, 16.) Joseph, though lord of all the land of Egypt, yet, believing the word and promise of God, concerning the posterity of Abraham, expressed his confident expectation, that they would be performed, in the removal of the Israelites to Canaan: and he ordered his bones to be carried along with them; both as an expression of his faith, and to show that he desired to have his lot, after death, with the people of God, and not with the Egyptians.

23 By <sup>r</sup> faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents, because they saw he was a proper child; <sup>s</sup> and they were not afraid of ‘the king’s commandment.

Note.—The parents of Moses also acted from the same powerful principle of faith in the word and promises of God. When that eminent deliverer and law-giver of Israel was born, they concealed him three months, from those who were appointed by Pharaoh to destroy the male children: for they perceived something uncommon in his appearance, which was supposed to indicate his future eminence. (Note, Acts 7:17—29.) By faith they relied on the promised care and protection of God: and so they “were not terrified by the king’s commandment,” but preserved the life of their son at the peril of their own. And they acted from the same kind of faith, when they trusted Moses to the care of Providence, in an ark of bulrushes; which believing expectation was answered in his preservation by Pharaoh’s daughter, and his education in the court of Egypt, to be the deliverer of Israel. (Notes, Ex. 2:1—10.)

24 By faith Moses, “when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh’s daughter;

Note.—In like manner, when Moses was grown up, even to the age of forty years, and was become very eminent among the Egyptians; (Note, Acts 7:17—29.) he “refused” any longer “to be called the Son of Pharaoh’s daughter,” though tradition reports, and Josephus states, that he was considered as heir of that prosperous kingdom. But, believing the testimony and promises of God concerning Israel, and especially that respecting the Messiah; he would not take his lot among the Egyptians, for the sake of temporal advantages, however great. On the contrary, seeing “the people of God” under the most cruel bondage, and in the most abject condition, he openly avowed himself to be one of them; choosing rather to suffer the most distressing affliction and injuries along with them, and to share the blessings promised to them, than to enjoy all the temporal pleasures, which his high station could have procured him, in the ways of sin and ungodliness. He likewise esteemed “the reproach” cast on Israel, for their expectations of a glorious Redeemer to arise from among them, under whose special care they professed themselves to be; as well as the disgrace of their enslaved condition, to be more valuable than all the immense treasures and revenues of Egypt; so that he renounced the latter, that he might partake of the former. For “he had respect unto the recompense of the reward;” even the gracious and abundant compensation, which Christ confers on all those, who are "reproached for his sake." In consequence of this believing choice and purpose, he renounced all his prospects and indulgences in Egypt; and became a refugee, or a stranger, and a humble laborious shepherd, in Midian for forty years. 27 By faith <sup>d</sup> he forsook Egypt, <sup>e</sup> not fearing the wrath of the king: for he <sup>f</sup> endured, <sup>g</sup> as seeing him who is invisible.

Note.—Moses evidently "feared," when he forsook Egypt the first time: (Note, Ex. 2:13—15.) but this relates to his leaving that kingdom the second time, when he led forth the tribes of Israel. He was then strengthened in faith, to disregard the wrath and power of king Pharaoh: he denounced the death of the first-born, left the tyrant's presence, as one who had defiance to his menaces, and marched out of Egypt with great intrepidity; though he was fully aware, that Pharaoh, with his army, would pursue him. And when that actually took place, he boldly said to the affrighted Israelites, "Fear not, stand still, and see the salvation of the LORD.—The LORD shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace." (Notes, Ex. 9:13—18, 33. 10:16, 17, 29. 11:4—8. 12:29—39. 14:1—14.) For "he endured" most constantly, in delivering his messages, and in this emergency, though he had no visible protection against the vengeance of Pharaoh; because, by "faith, as the evidence of things not seen," he saw the invisible God as his almighty Defender, and rested assured that he was with him, to take care of and deliver him. (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 1 Tim. 6:13—16.)

28 Through faith <sup>h</sup> he kept the passover, and <sup>i</sup> the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them.

Note.—By the same efficacious faith, Moses foresaw the destruction of the first-born in Egypt, and expected the exemption of Israel from that calamity in the way which the Lord prescribed unto him. He therefore influenced the people to keep the Passover, with "the sprinkling of the blood" upon the door-posts, and the other significant ceremonies: lest the destroying angel should enter their houses also. In this manner they were preserved, and this made way for their deliverance out of bondage.—The whole of this institution has been shown to be not only a memorial of Israel's deliverance, but a typical prefiguration of our salvation by the death of Christ, and by faith in his blood. (Notes, Ex. 12:3—27. Matt. 26:26—28. 1 Cor. 5:6—8.)

29 By faith <sup>k</sup> they passed through the Red sea as by dry land; which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned.

Note.—Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Caleb, and others, truly believed; and the rest of the nation, by the exhortations of Moses, were excited to a confidence in JENOVAH's power and favor, for present deliverance from Pharaoh. But it was chiefly by the faith of Moses, their leader, that the Israelites passed safely through the Red sea: even as Noah's family were preserved in the ark, by means of his faith; though it does not appear, that they were all true believers. (Note, 7.) Israel was the visible church of God, and the type of the whole multitude, who by faith pass through trials and death unhurt: but the Egyptians represented the enemies of God and of his people; and, copying Pharaoh's pride and presumption, they ventured to pursue the Israelites into the sea, and so perished; as all the enemies of the Lord will do at death, which delivers all believers from their enmity and rage. This does not authorize us to suppose, that any of those, here mentioned by name, were destitute of justifying faith; as some have inferred from the subsequent unbelief of many, who passed safely through the Red Sea. (Notes, Ex. 14:10—31. 15:1—18. Ps. 106:12—14.)

Note.—(Notes, Josh. 6:) Joshua, and many of the Israelites, believing the promise of God, that he would deliver Jericho into their hands, obeyed his command, and induced their brethren to do the same, in respect of the extraordinary means used for that purpose. They expected God to perform his word; and they observed his directions, in marching round the city, and blowing the trumpets for seven days: and in this manner the walls fell down at the appointed time, and afforded them a safe and easy victory. The same principle would lead them to embrace the promises concerning the Messiah, and salvation by him: but in collective bodies, there has always subsisted the difference between real believers, and professors of faith, who concurred with them in the same external services.—"As the land of Canaan belonged to 'the Israelites, by a grant from "God, the Possessor of heaven and earth;" it was proper that 'the first city, which resisted them, should be 'taken in such a manner, as to demonstrate the 'truth of their title.—Thus were ... all the Ca-

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Even Rahab the harlot, hearing that God had denounced the destruction of the Canaanites, and that he had promised manifold blessings to Israel, by faith renounced her connexion with the enemies of God, and sought admission among his people. At the hazard of her life, she entertained, peaceably and as friends, the spies of Israel; and, assured that Jericho would be taken by the Israelites, she stipulated for her own life and that of her relations, as if that event had already taken place. Thus she escaped the destruction of her unbelieving citizens, who persisted in their enmity to God and to Israel.—Doubtless she embraced the promises concerning the Messiah and spiritual salvation, in the same obedient manner, when she was made acquainted with them; and thus she was incorporated among the Israelites, and became an ancestor of Christ.—But the fruits and the infirmities of her faith have already been fully considered. 32 And <sup>n</sup> what shall I more say? for <sup>o</sup> the time would fail me to tell of <sup>p</sup> Gideon, and of <sup>q</sup> Barak, and of <sup>r</sup> Samson, and of <sup>s</sup> Jephthah, of <sup>t</sup> David also, and <sup>u</sup> Samuel, and of <sup>x</sup> the prophets:

Note.—The history of the eminent persons, here mentioned in general terms, has already been considered. It would have exceeded proper bounds, for the apostle to speak particularly concerning each of them, and of all who might have been adduced as examples in this argument. These, who are mentioned, are not placed in the order of time in which they lived, but as they occurred to the apostle's mind: and the whole succession of the prophets are mentioned at once. By faith, crediting the testimony of God, and substantiating his promises, some of them, namely, Joshua and David, subdued the nations of Canaan and the neighboring kingdoms, as the servants of God in the cause of Israel. (Notes, Josh. 6:—11: 2 Sam. 5:6-25. 8: 10:) Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson, had wrought wonderful deliverances for their people, in dependence on the power, and obedience to the commands of God. (Notes, Judg. 6:—8: 11:13:—16:) Others performed most eminent obedience to his commandments, or executed justice and reformed the nation; and they waited for and obtained most remarkable accomplishments of the divine promises, to them and their people. Some had even, in the exercise of faith in God, been enabled to stop the mouths of lions. Samson and David slew each of them a lion. (Notes, Judg. 14: 1 Sam. 17: 34-37.) Daniel the prophet spent the night in a den of hungry lions. (Notes, Dan. 6:) Others quenched the violence of fire. (Notes, Dan. 3:) Elijah was repeatedly delivered from the persecuting rage of Ahab, Jezebel, and Ahaziah; Michaiiah, from that of Ahab; Elisha, from the sword of the kings of Israel and Syria; and Jeremiah from that of Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah's princes. (Notes, 1 Kings 17: 18: 19: 22: 2 Kings 1:—4: Jer. 26: 38:8-13.) Hezekiah and others were miraculously recovered from sickness; and Hezekiah's kingdom was restored, from the utmost debility, to a very flourishing condition, in answer to his confidence in God. Many instances occur in the history of Israel, of those who waxed valiant in fight, and turned to flight the armies of the aliens; or, "laid prostrate their camps." (1 Sam. 11:11. 17:53. 2 Kings 7:) Yet it has generally been supposed, that there is a peculiar reference to the successes of Judas Maccabeus and his brethren, against the forces of Antiochus Epiphanes; when from feeble beginnings they arrived at great power, and defeated all that persecutor's devices, by faith in the promises and protection of the Lord.—While we make a decided difference, between the word of God and all other writings; there seems no impropriety in supposing that the apostle had these events in his view, on this occasion: as the historical facts respecting the persecutions of Antiochus and the victories of the Maccabees, were well known among the Hebrews; and really formed an illustrious example of the efficacy and nature of faith.

Note.—Through the same powerful principle of faith, as exercised by the prophets, and the other persons concerned, women had received their dead children raised to life again. (Notes, 1 Kings 17:17—24. 2 Kings 4:13—37.) Others were tortured with all the horrid ingenuity, which their cruel persecutors could exercise; and yet refused to “accept of deliverance” from their agonies, when offered them, on condition that they would commit idolatry. They rather chose to expire in their torture, than to purchase life on such terms: because by faith they expected “a better resurrection,” even a resurrection to eternal life; which was far better than being restored from the jaws of death, and living a while longer in this world; and even far better than the resurrections to temporal life before mentioned. This is supposed to refer to the tortures and death of a woman and her seven sons, as recorded in the history of the Maccabees. (2 Mae. 7:)—This is a most decisive testimony of the sacred writer, that his countrymen expected a resurrection to eternal life, and that the word of God warranted that expectation.—Others in different ages, had been tried by “cruel mockings,” and every kind of indignity and derision; with ignominious and painful scourgings, and with lingering sufferings in bonds and imprisonment: yet by faith they cleaved to God and their duty, amidst all that could be inflicted on them. Thus Micaiah, Jeremiah, and many others had been abused. (Notes, 1 Kings 22:9,26,27. Jer. 20: 26:10—24. 37: 38:.) Moreover, several had been stoned to death; and some had even been cruelly sawn asunder, as tradition reported that Isaiah had been. (Notes, 2 Kings 21:16. Is. 1:1.) Others had been tempted with the most complicated sufferings, and with conditional offers of deliverance, to sin against God. Some were slain at once with the sword; whilst others were driven from their habitations, to wander as vagabonds, covered with undressed skins instead of suitable raiment; and to inhabit mountains, deserts, dens, and caves, instead of commodious houses; being destitute of friends, afflicted by complicated distresses, and most cruelly tortured, when they fell into the hands of their persecutors. Yet they still trusted in God, and obeyed him, with unremitting patience and constancy, in a realizing belief of his promises of support, comfort, and eternal salvation, and an unwavering confidence in them. Of these excellent persons “the world,” which used them with such contempt and cruelty, “was not worthy;” and therefore they were soon removed, in mercy to them, and in judgment to their enemies. The cases of David, Elijah, and many others, recorded in scripture, may be alluded to: but doubtless many others occurred, during the persecuting reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel, of which particular accounts have not reached us; though some records or traditions concerning them might be extant among the Hebrews, when the apostle wrote. 39 And these all, <sup>t</sup> having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise:

Note.—All the persons above enumerated, had “obtained a good report” in the church, and most of them had been mentioned with honor in the word of God, though the world abhorred and execrated them: but “faith” was that peculiarity, by which they were distinguished from other men, both in respect of acceptance with God, and as the powerful principle of their zealous obedience, their patient sufferings, or their remarkable exploits and deliverances. Yet “they received not the promise,” which their faith especially embraced; they did not live to see the accomplishment of the promise concerning the Messiah, “in whom all nations should be blessed,” which was the grand promise made to Abraham; though they were saved by the anticipated efficacy of his sacrifice. For God, in his wise and righteous sovereignty, had reserved some better thing for his church under the Christian dispensation; (Notes, Matt. 13:16,17. Luke 10:23,24.) that these ancient believers might not be complete, in their salvation and felicity, except in and by Jesus Christ, and by sharing those benefits, which were at length more openly revealed to his people: that so the whole church, by union with Christ, might be perfected in one body, and not in separate divisions; though the members of it had been scattered, as it were, through all the ages and nations of the earth. (Eph. 1:10.)—Various interpretations have been given of this passage. Some suppose that the promise was that of “the better church,” which the patriarchs desired; (Note, 13—16.) but unto which they were not admitted, nor will be admitted, till the whole multitude of heirs shall be collected together at the end of the world. "righteous entereth into rest;" that "it is better to depart to be with Christ;" and that "when absent from the body, believers are present with the Lord;" "blessed are the dead, who die in the Lord, &c." confine the meaning almost wholly to deliverance from persecution!—But was not the promise of a Redeemer, from the first fall of Adam, the grand promise to fallen man? (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. 12:1—3. 49:10.) This "promise" the patriarchs received, and cordially embraced in faith (17): but they did not live to obtain the thing promised. They were indeed saved by faith in a Redeemer, who was to come; but without those events, which the apostles testified as already past, their pardon and acceptance could not be ratified, or their salvation perfected. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) Thus the Old Testament believers could not be perfected, except by communion with the New Testament church, in the promised Saviour, and his righteousness, atonement, and intercession. #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The wisdom and goodness of God are peculiarly manifested, in the appointment of "faith," to be both the recipient of Christ for justification, and the efficacious principle of our obedience: and, in neither case, will any thing avail, but that faith which gives the soul, as it were, an appropriating hold of "things hoped for," and an internal demonstration of "things not seen."—As men easily remove, and raise to a great height, immense bodies, by means of proper engines, which could not otherwise be done at all; so faith exercised on the promises, truth, power, and perfections of God, would enable a feeble sinner to remove a mountain, if that were necessary for his safety and advantage. (Notes, Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:22—26.) Without this, no man, since Adam's fall, has "obtained a good report," or done any real and acceptable "good works," according to the standard of the sacred word. Indeed in all respects, the worthies of the church are very different from the admired characters of the world.—We know nothing to good purpose, concerning the perfections or works of God, or the eternal state, except by this "evidence of things not seen:" men's reasonings produce amusing speculations; but "the sure testimony of God," received by faith, brings satisfaction to the soul. While we credit his account of the creation; we learn to adore and obey the Creator, with humble, thankful, and admiring hearts; which philosophers, in general, with a few honorable exceptions, ancient and modern, have scarcely appeared to do: and those few were led to do it, not by philosophy, but by believing the word of God.—Faith indeed receives the testimony of God concerning his creating and providential wisdom, power, and goodness; yet his truths and promises, respecting redemption, constitute its peculiar province. Believing his testimony concerning the future judgment and the eternal world; and even more than believing, that we are sinners exposed to condemnation, and deserving of it, according to the tenor of his righteous law; we gladly receive the truth, concerning salvation by grace, through the atoning blood of the divine Saviour; and wait on him for pardon and every blessing, as "his gift through Jesus Christ." (Notes, Rom. 6:21—23. 1 John 5:11, 12.) Thus we are enabled, "by faith," to plead a far more excellent sacrifice, and to present more acceptable worship, than any Pharisee or infidel can offer unto God, according to the vain devices of a proud impenitent heart: we obtain "the testimony of God," in his word, and by his Spirit, that our persons and services are accepted with him: and, however we may be persecuted, or driven out of the world, our felicity will be sure; and we shall long to declare to all around us, and to leave it upon record for those who shall come after, that this is the only way to heaven, and that we are exceedingly thankful for having been taught to walk in it. (Notes, 1 John 5:19—21.) It would be madness for us to expect to escape the pangs of death, as Enoch and Elijah did; but we may hope to be with God, when no longer found on earth: as having "pleased him," by coming in faith to his mercy-seat, desiring his favor as our portion, and not only believing that "he is," but that he is the gracious "Rewarder," even of sinners "who diligently seek him;" for "without this faith it is impossible to please God."—If we possess this "evidence of things not seen," we shall hear, with great interest, the warnings of the oracles of God, concerning the future and eternal misery of the ungodly; we shall reverence the denunciation which unbelievers deride, object to, or blaspheme; we shall be "moved with fear to flee from the wrath to come;" we shall be encouraged in hope to make Christ our Refuge, and to leave all other things, as comparatively worthless, to seek admission into this ark. Thus we shall be safe, during the troubles of life, the terrors of death, and the solemnities of judgment, when "the wicked shall be turned into hell, even all the people that forget God:" and we may, in the mean time, hope to be the instruments of saving our beloved children and relatives also. But then, we must be contented to bear the reproach of singularity, enthusiasm, or hypocrisy: we must be unfashionable; and the world will condemn us, if our profession and behavior "condemn the world:" (Note, John 7:3—10.) and this will certainly be the case, if we "become heirs of the righteousness which is by faith." We may however by faith foresee the time, when our revilers will wish, but wish in vain, that they were with us in the despised ark.

V. 8—19.

That is not justifying faith, which does not obey the command, as well as rely on the promise of God. We too are called to leave many of our worldly connexions, interests, and comforts, to go in quest of a future inheritance; and if heirs of Abraham's faith, we shall "obey," and "go forth not knowing" "what things may befall us," or whether the Lord may lead us; we shall wait in the way of duty for the performance of his promises; we shall not take up our rest in the world, or be satisfied with its most splendid accommodations; but we shall "seek for a city which hath foundations," whose Architect and Founder is the LORD of hosts. Indeed, our faith will not be always alike vigorous and efficacious; and its waverings will show, that we are not saved for it, though by it: yet, upon recollection, "judging him faithful, who hath promised," we shall be strengthened to expect the blessing, in defiance of apparent difficulties and supposed impossibilities; and thus shall be enabled to perform whatever is connected with obtaining the promises. If indeed we professed to seek a portion in the world, the advantages of religion might appear dubious: but we avow ourselves to be "strangers" in a foreign land, and on our pilgrimage to our desired home, where "our treasure and our hearts already are." We have not yet received the blessings, but we "see them afar off, embrace them, and wait in hope" for the accomplishment of the promises: and we profess to be satisfied with the life of a sojourner and a pilgrim, and to wait till after death for our felicity. If, like apostates, we were minded to "return to the country whence we came out;" we might "find an opportunity" of doing it, perhaps with some secular advantage: but faith shows us, that it is devoted to destruction, with all those who choose their inheritance in it. We therefore "desire a better country, that is, an heavenly;" and as God has prepared everlasting mansions for us, in the city of his special abode, in which he will make us most blessed for evermore; so his glory in our salvation, and our wisdom in choosing him for our Portion, will be most manifest in the event, whatever present appearances may be. This faith "endures to the end;" we must live by it and die in it; and then have its expectations answered, and far exceeded. Whilst we live, our faith must be repeatedly and sharply tried, that we may be distinguished from mere professors of Christianity; but we may expect, that we shall be strengthened in proportion to the trial: nor can we reasonably doubt of the power of faith, to produce the most unreserved obedience, when we remember, that by this principle "Abraham, when tried, offered his beloved Isaac" as a burnt-offering at God's command; and trusted in him to perform all those promises, which his obedience seemed about for ever to render vain, and their fulfilment impossible. Let us then inquire how far our faith has produced similar obedience, when we have been called to acts of inferior self-denial, or to make inferior sacrifices to our duty: and whether we have given up what was called for, in an unreserved confidence that the Lord would make up all our losses, and even bless us by means of the most afflictive dispensations. For, as "He spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him freely give us all things?" And what should we deem too valuable to give up, at the call of such a merciful and bounteous Benefactor?

While we desire, in faith, to "bless our children" and worship God during life, and at the approach of death, and afterwards to have our lot with his people in the heavenly Canaan; and while we attend to every relative duty, trusting in the Lord, and "not fearing the wrath" of man: let us particularly note the effects of the faith of Moses; and ask ourselves, whether we have been influenced to a similar judgment, choice, and experience. Have we,

"by faith," learned to prefer the sanctified "affliction of the people of God," to "the enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season?" Do we deem it an honor and a privilege to be "reproached for the sake of Christ;" and to prefer loss in his cause, to the riches of this evil world; having "respect to the great reward" promised to those who are thus distinguished? All believers are not called to make the same sacrifices, or to endure the same trials, "for righteousness, sake;" nor have all the same measure of faith: yet without some experience and consciousness of this kind we are not warranted to conclude that we are of Moses's religion: for a common walking stick more resembles Aaron's fruitful rod, than the faith of many modern professors of evangelical truth does the self-denying faith of Moses or of Abraham.—But the subject is absolutely inexhaustible: we must by faith "overcome" the fear of man, as well as the love of the world; we must endure all sufferings, and venture all consequences, in the way of duty, "as seeing Him who is invisible." In all things our faith must respect the true paschal "Lamb, and the sprinkling of his blood," for deliverance from the destruction of the wicked; and we must conscientiously observe his ordinances, as means of grace to our souls. Then, by faith we may pass, at God's command, through seas of tribulation, and scenes of temptation or danger, during life and at death; in which all unbelievers must sink and perish for ever.—By faith we must implicitly use every means, however unlikely, which God prescribes in order to our obtaining the promises; trusting in him alone to render them effectual: nor will any perish with the enemies of God, who believe his word, and show it by love to his people; whatever former crimes they have committed, or in whatever situation they may be found.

V. 32—40.

"Faith" will enable a man to serve God, and his generation, in whatever way he may be employed, whether in governing or reforming nations, or defending them, by crushing the power of iniquitous assailants: or in preaching the gospel, and boldly testifying against the crimes of the most mighty and implacable of its opposers; or by "working righteousness," and obtaining promises in a more obscure station. It will influence a man to such prompt obedience, disinterested diligence, and warranted expectation, as will ensure all needful success in his undertakings. It will also prepare him for facing any dangers: and though we do not now expect to "stop the mouths of lions," or to "quench the violence of the fire;" yet we are authorized to look for proportionable supports and consolations, if called to end our pilgrimage by the hand of violence. But we are chiefly concerned in the spiritual warfare: and in this, "by faith, we shall out of weakness be made strong, wax valiant in fight, and put to flight the armies of the aliens."—Though we do not hope to have "our dead restored again to life" in this world; yet faith will mingle joy with our tears over them; and teach us to "refuse deliverance" from suffering by sin, whilst we hope for "the better resurrection" which God has promised to his people. "Trials of cruel mockings" we may expect, even in these favored days; though hitherto exempted from scourgings, bonds, and imprisonments. We seem not to have immediate cause to apprehend being "stoned, or sawn asunder, or slain by the sword:" yet we shall surely be "tempted;" and we cannot overcome temptation, except by that faith which supported the martyrs, and made them more than conquerors over the fear of torment and death. If then we are ready to shrink, or droop, under our lighter trials; let us think of those excellent men, of whom "the world was not worthy;" and reflect how "desitute, afflicted, and tormented" they were; and how they were driven out, and wandered as outcasts "in mountains and dens and caves of the earth." For as our advantages, "with those better things, which God hath provided for us," are so much superior to theirs; so should our "obedience of faith, and patience of hope, and labor of love," be more distinguished. Let us then pray continually for the increase of our faith, that we may follow these illustrious examples, and be with them at length made perfect in holiness and felicity, and "shine like the sun in the kingdom of our Father" for evermore.

CHAP. XII.

Exhortations to constancy, patience, and diligence, deduced from the abundant testimony of former believers, from the example of Christ, and from the loving intent and salutary effect of the Lord's corrections, 1 13; to peace and holiness, and to jealous watchfulness over ourselves, and each other, enforced by the case of Esau, 14—17; to an obedient reception of the gospel, and reverential worship of God, from the superior excellency of the Christian dispensation, and the proportionably greater guilt and danger of neglecting it, 18—29.

Note.—The apostle next called on the Hebrews, to consider themselves as "encompassed about with witnesses," who bore their combined and most decided testimony to the faithfulness of God, and to the power and efficacy of faith, as innumerable as the drops of water in a cloud. The persons before mentioned, and multitudes besides, seemed to look down from heaven, or even to come from thence, to surround them, and to bear testimony in the cause; as well as to be spectators of their conduct, in that arduous, perilous, and honorable race, in which they themselves had got so blessed a victory. Professed Christians ought therefore with one consent, to "lay aside every weight;" (as men laid aside their superfluous garments, or more costly ornaments, when about to run in the Isthmian games, or to contend in the race on any occasion;) and not to burden themselves with worldly cares, interests, or indulgences; idolatrous attachments, or needless hurry of business, which might hinder their spiritual progress, and cause them to loiter, to move heavily, or to look back, and so to endanger the loss of his race. They should also watch against, and seek a decided victory over, natural depravity and evil habits; which would still continually "beset them," and take advantage, so to speak, of every favorable circumstance; and especially of those sinful propensities, which on any account had a peculiar power against them. In particular they ought to use every means of conquering unbelief; through which they were tempted to apostatize, from love of the world, and fear of suffering. This was "the sin which most easily beset them," in those times of persecution; many had been cast down by it, many more were in danger, and they all would doubtless be vigorously assaulted on that side. It behoved them, therefore, to get rid of every incumbrance, and to seek the increase of their faith, and the crucifixion of their worldly lusts; that they might "press forward," with progressive earnestness, and unwearied patience, in the persevering obedience of faith in Christ. This was "the race set before them," in which they must either win the crown of glory, or have everlasting misery and ignominy for their portion. (*Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—27. vain glory of the world, the number and power of their enemies, and their own weakness and sinfulness; but even from these inferior luminaries, that they might behold that glorious "Sun," from which even those received all the light, that rendered them so resplendent. (Note, John 1:16.) In order to their more full instruction and encouragement, they must look steadily to Jesus; not merely as one, who had run his glorious race, and completed his work, by faith in the promises and covenant engagements of the Father; but as "the Author and Finisher of faith" itself. He alone had opened the way for men to return to God and to enter heaven, "by faith;" when sin had closed for ever that of personal righteousness: from him, as the great Prophet of the church, the doctrine of faith had been delivered from the beginning, and perfected in the revelation made by the gospel: and this none would ever be authorized to change, add to, or deduct from. He alone, by his Spirit, produces "faith" in the hearts of his people, which he maintains, increases, and perfects, in its nature and fruits, till its work be finished. So that, they must look to him for faith, as well as by faith. He indeed did not want that faith, by which a sinner is justified; yet "in finishing his work" on earth, he led his people the way to complete victory over every enemy, by a patient, obedient reliance on the word of his heavenly Father. (Note, Ps. 16:8—11.) As he had "in all things the pre-eminence;" so he did not enter into his mediatorial glory, without having the precedency in the measure of his sufferings, above all others who ever went to heaven. "For the joy set before him," of his own personal exaltation to the mediatorial throne; of the salvation of countless millions of lost sinners from destruction; of bringing them to endless happiness; and of eternally glorifying the whole name, and all the perfections of God; (Notes, Matt. 25:19—23. John 17:22,23.) he, with the utmost fortitude and constancy, endured all his other humiliating sufferings, from his birth in the stable to his agony in the garden; and at length most willingly submitted to be suspended on the cross, and there to expire in lingering tortures. Though this method of execution was peculiarly ignominious, and by the law pronounced accursed; and though his crucifixion was attended with unheard of circumstances of indignity, outrage, revilings, and derision; yet he disregarded and even "despised the shame," as well as the anguish of it, as not worthy to be compared with the glorious event, which he had in full view. Thus, having "endured" until his undertaking was finished, he was speedily raised from the dead, and exalted to "the right hand of the throne of God." (Notes, 1:3,4. 8:1,2.) The disciples ought therefore to look unto him, both as an example of constancy and patience; as the Author of their strength, encouragement, victory, and salvation; and as a glorious instance of the blessed effect of perseverance, amidst reproaches and sufferings, in cleaving unto God and being "faithful unto death." This case was so extraordinary, that they would do well to "consider it," even with arithmetical exactness, and to estimate the dignity and excellency of the sufferer; "the contradiction of sinners" against him, who ensnared, reviled, opposed, and accused him, with most perverse enmity against his holy doctrine and example, and with malignant ingratitude for all his love; the intensesness and variety of his sufferings; the meek and composed fortitude with which he endured them; the love, which moved him thus to suffer, and the most blessed consequences of his humiliation. When they began to grow "weary and faint in their minds," with trials and injuries from their malicious persecutors, such considerations would serve to quiet and encourage them: whilst they recollected, that the holy Jesus suffered to save them from deserved and eternal misery; and that sinners of the same nature with themselves inflicted these tortures; that he had much bitterness in his cup, which was not in theirs; (Notes, Matt. 26:36—39. John 1:29. Gal. 6:11—14.) that he was hated for his own sake, and they only because of their relation to him; and that his cross secured a happy event, to all their conflicts and trials in his cause. In short, by "looking to him," every kind of humiliating and animating topic would occur to their minds, to invigorate the exercise of their holy affections, and to repress every corrupt propensity.

Note.—The Hebrews had indeed suffered the loss of property, and even bonds and scourgings, for cleaving to Christ; (Note, 10:32—34.) and in maintaining their personal conflict against sin and temptation, and the contest of the whole army of Christ against the common cause of sin and Satan. They, however, whom the sacred writer addressed, had not yet “resisted unto blood.” Many of their brethren had chosen to die in this conflict, rather than yield the victory to their enemies, by renouncing the gospel: even men of like infirmities with themselves, had endured more, by faith, in the cause of God, than they had been called to do; and their sufferings for Christ were unspeakably less, than his for them had been: so that they ought to be ashamed of their cowardice, if they grew weary, or fainted in the contest, because of their inferior trials. (Notes, 2,3. Job 4:3—6. Prov. 24:10. 2 Cor. 4:1,2, 13—18. Gal. 6:6—10.) It would in that case appear, that they had “forgotten the exhortation” of the Lord, who, by Solomon, addressed believers as his children, when he called on them not to “despise his chastening,” nor yet to “faint” under it. (Notes, Job 5:17. Prov. 3:11,12.) Whatever instrument was employed; they were thus taught to recognise the fatherly correction of God, in their trials; and neither to disregard them, with stoutness of spirit, and unfeeling contempt, as if they called for no humiliation, were capable of no improvement, had no meaning, and were easily supported; nor yet to faint, despond, turn aside, or seek relief by sin, when suffering under them. For the Lord corrects all the objects of his love; and “scourgeth every one, whom he receiveth” as his adopted child, into his family, and distinguishes by his peculiar regard. If then they endured their afflictions as fatherly chastisements, in a submissive spirit and with due constancy; it would evidently appear that the Lord was “dealing with them as with children!” for indeed, among men, it might be inquired, “What son is he, whom his father,” on no occasion, “chasteneth?” All need correction; all who are properly educated receive it; no wise and kind father entirely withholds it; and no children are wholly exempted from the pain of salutary discipline, except such as are indulged to their ruin. (Notes, Prov. 13:24. 19:18. 22:15. 23:13,14. 29:15,17.) So that, if the professed people of God were not at all corrected, it might be inferred, that he did not own them as his children, but considered them as spurious; members of the visible church, but not “born of the Spirit,” or educated for the “inheritance of his saints.” (Note, Gal. 4:21—31.)—The allusion may either be made to such children, as a man deems to be spurious, though born of his wife; because he suspects her of having been unfaithful, and therefore he will bestow no pains about them; or such, as the real father neglects, because they are illegitimate, and he is ashamed to own them: (Notes, Judg. 9: 11:1,2.) but the former case seems more exactly to accord to the

Note.—“The fathers according to the flesh,” of those whom the apostle addressed, had corrected them in their younger years: and though the chastisement “seemed grievous” to them; yet they did not leave them on that account, but rather learned to stand in awe of their authority, and to fear giving them further offence: and, when they were grown up, they became sensible, that this discipline had been productive of great good to them. Was it not therefore much more proper for them to submit to “the Father of Spirits,” the Creator of their souls, and the Giver of spiritual life; (Marg. Ref. i;) when that subjection was essentially connected with their salvation, and nothing but death eternal could be the consequence of their rebelling against him? For indeed the corrections of their earthly parents, during the few days of their childhood, had been inflicted “after their own pleasure;” and were often, in a great degree, the effect of their own passions, rather than of a prudent design for the good of the children: but their heavenly Father corrected them, though with apparent severity, during the short time of their continuance on earth; entirely, with a wise and faithful regard to their profit; and in order to make them “partakers of his holiness,” by mortifying their pride and carnal lusts, and bringing them, through such discipline, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, to be conformed to himself in judgment, dispositions, and conduct. By these means, he showed them the vanity of the world, the evil nature and effects of sin, the depravity of their own hearts, and the preciousness of his salvation; and so trained them up to humility, spirituality, simplicity, tenderness, submission, love, reverence, gratitude, compassion, and every holy affection. Now they ought not to suppose, that these salutary corrections ever appeared pleasant, or "matter of joy," to the persons who were enduring them: on the contrary, they always seemed for the present "a source of grief," and caused much anguish; nor could they otherwise answer the intention. So that the sufferers often thought their trials did them harm, and would end in their ruin: yet afterwards, when the tumult of their passions had subsided, and they were able to deliberate on the instructions which they received under them; they were convinced that they amply compensated for the anguish, by "yielding the peaceable fruits of righteousness," and bringing them into a disposition, quietly to submit to God, and meekly to bear the injuries of men; and by rendering them fruitful in all those "good works," which evinced them to be justified, and at peace with God, and, which tended to give them inward peace, joy, and confidence in him. Thus having been "exercised," disciplined, or instructed, by sanctified afflictions; they would afterwards possess the benefit of them, when the pain was over; even though at the time they seemed to irritate their corrupt passions, and tended immediately to make a discovery of the evils of their hearts, for their subsequent humiliation.

13 And <sup>r</sup> make * straight paths for your feet, lest that which is <sup>s</sup> lame be turned out of the way; <sup>t</sup> but let it rather be healed.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The considerations above insisted on should induce the Hebrews, both in respect of themselves and of each other, to observe the counsel of the prophet. (Note, Is. 35:3,4.)—They should endeavor to counteract every disposition to faint, despond, or renounce the profession of the gospel, because of persecutions: considering them as fatherly corrections for their profit, submitting to them as such, and seeking to have them sanctified; and directing and encouraging each other to take the same course. Thus they ought patiently and firmly to maintain their profession, and go on in the path of holy obedience; and, by proper instructions, admonitions, and counsels, to oppose every false doctrine, and remove every stumbling-block. Thus "straight paths" might be made "for their feet," though the road itself was rough and thorny; lest any of those who were discouraged, or who, like lame persons, proceeded with difficulty and pain, should be turned out of the way, to seek an easier path, by concealing or acting inconsistently with their profession. (Note, Is. 57:14.) On the contrary, care should be taken that such persons might be "healed," and confirmed by suitable encouragements and cautions, whilst there remained any hope concerning them.—Lift up, &c.] The quotation is rather from the Hebrew, than the Septuagint; which is, "Be strong, ye hands which hang down, and ye fainting knees."

Note.—Whilst the persons addressed, thus steadfastly adhered to the truth, and contended for it; it was also incumbent on them to avoid all discord and resentment, "and to pursue peace with all men," even though it seemed to flee from them. They ought, as far as truth and duty would permit, to live peaceably with Jews and Gentiles, and to bear or concede every thing for that purpose; and they should study to be at peace with each other, and with their Gentile brethren. This would greatly aid them in "following after holiness," and in seeking nearer conformity to the spiritual law and perfect character of God, as exhibited in the example of Christ: nor must they even "seek peace," so as to neglect the practice and pursuit of holiness, or by connivance at sin: "for without holiness no man," of any religion, "could see the Lord." None could behold his manifested glory, and commune with him in comfort, whilst in this world, without "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience;" nor could any one be capable of the beatific vision hereafter, or admitted to it, without being made "holy even as God is holy."—It should be noted, that humiliation, brokenness of heart, and proper affections towards the Lord Jesus, are essential to the holiness of a redeemed sinner; and all else, however specious, must be counterfeited, where these are wanting. † Or, way to change his mind.

Note.—It behoved Christians “to look diligently,” both to themselves, and likewise to each other, in respect of their principles and conduct; “lest any one should fail” of an interest in the special mercy and favor of God, or remain destitute of his sanctifying grace, and so be left to apostatize: (Notes, 3:7—13. 4:1,2. 10:19—22.) and lest “any root of bitterness,” any unmortified lust in the heart, which seemed to be dead, should spring up and shoot forth its bitter and poisonous produce, in heretical doctrines, or scandalous practices, to the trouble and disturbance of the whole body, and the defiling and corrupting of numbers; as frequently had been done. (Notes, Deut. 29:13—20. 1 Cor. 5:6—13. 15:31—34. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 3:6—9.) For instance, lest any one among them should commit fornication, under a mistaken notion of Christian liberty: or lest there should be some “profane” person, who so despised the peculiar blessings of the new covenant, as to barter them away for temporal advantages; like Esau, who for one meal of meat sold his birth-right. (Notes, Gen. 25:30—34.) That example ought to be a warning to them, not to renounce Christianity for the sake of worldly ease, interest, or indulgence: for when Esau “afterwards willed to inherit the blessing, he was rejected,” both by the Lord, and by his father Isaac. (Notes, Gen. 27:33—42.) Thus he found no place or opportunity “for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.” The whole history of Esau shows, that he, at that time at least, neither truly repented of all his sins, nor sought to do it. But he was grieved and vexed at being circumvented by Jacob; he was sorry that he had made so foolish a bargain; he coveted the temporal advantages which belonged to the birth-right, especially the dominion over his brother; he had altered his mind in that particular, and he sought carefully, and with tears, to induce Isaac to alter his purpose, to retract Jacob’s blessing, and to bestow it on him; but he sought this in vain, for it was then too late. The latter, however, even the change of mind in Isaac, which might induce him to retract the blessing pronounced on Jacob, and to confer it on him, seems to be the repentance which Esau sought with tears.—Thus the time would shortly come, when they, who refused spiritual blessings for the sake of temporal interests, would become fully sensible of their madness and folly; and would be glad to reverse the fatal bargain; but “that must be let alone for ever.” This was another awful warning against apostacy; but it has no relation to the case of those who earnestly desire and pray for repentance. 21 And so terrible was the sight, that <sup>q</sup> Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake:)

Note.—The apostle again returned to his former position, that the superior excellency of the Christian dispensation would render it proportionably more criminal and perilous to reject it; for his discourse was equally suited to warn avowed unbelievers, and those who were tempted to apostacy. (Notes, 2:1—4. 6:4—8. 10:28—31.) He did not speak of the state of individuals, as converted or unconverted; but of the different method, in which God now spake to the nation, from that in which he delivered the law to their fathers. This he showed by an allusion to the two mountains, Sinai and Zion. (Note, Gal. 4:21—31.) For, though God at length spake to his people from mount Zion and the mercy-seat, through the atonements and ministrations of the high priest; this was only in a typical and obscure manner: (Notes, 7:—9: 10:1—18.) “the way into the holiest was not made manifest” under that dispensation; but the law was delivered from mount Sinai, and the national covenant was there ratified. (Notes, Ex. 19:5. 24:.) That dispensation, however, was at length abolished, and another introduced. The Lord therefore did not now call them to assemble, and hear him speak to them from the material mountain, which was capable of being touched, (though their fathers had been forbidden to touch it,) from whence most tremendous displays of the divine glory had been made, when the law was given, and the terrors attending on it made the people entreat, that JEHOVAH would no more speak to them in that way; as “they could not endure the things which were spoken.” (Notes, Ex. 19:10—24. 20:18—20. Deut. 4:13. 5:28, 29.) Indeed the severe restraints laid on them, and the terrible things seen and heard by them, filled them with dismay; and even made Moses exclaim, that “he exceedingly feared and quaked;” notwithstanding his typical office of mediator, his peculiar sanctity, and the long and intimate communion with God which he had maintained. (Note, Ex. 19:16—20.)—The whole of the scene showed the impossibility of a sinner’s coming before God with acceptance, according to the works of the law, the highly criminal presumption of attempting it, and the need of a Mediator and a better covenant: and it was to the apostle’s purpose, to call off the Note.—The Hebrew converts to Christianity ought to consider themselves, as summoned by the preachers of the gospel, to come to "mount Zion," or as actually convened there, to hear the voice of God from the mercy-seat. They were, professedly, become inhabitants of "the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem," the place of the Lord's special residence with his covenant people and accepted worshippers, of which Jerusalem had been a type: at least they were invited to enter, and become citizens of that favored city. This meant the church of Christ on earth, with all its special privileges, ordinances, and promises; as connected with the holy residence of God in heaven, and as continually transmitting to it new inhabitants. (Notes, Is. 12:4—6. Gal. 4: 21—31. Rev. 11:1, 2. 14:1—5. 21:9—27.) They were also called to hear the voice of God, in the presence of an "innumerable company of angels," or, "ten thousands of angels." These were all "spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation," who were invited to participate their happiness, and to join and emulate their worship. (Note, 1:13, 14.)—Moreover, Christians were come to unite, not with the congregation of Israel, but with "the assembly and church of the first-born," those who were specially devoted to God; his children, and heirs of the heavenly inheritance.

(Notes, Ex. 4:22, 23. 13:2. Num. 3:41—43. Rom. 8:28—31. Col. 1:15—17.) Their names were not indeed always enrolled, in the genealogies or registers of the Lord's people on earth; but "they were written in heaven," as the elect of God, born of the Spirit, denizens of that heavenly city, and entitled to all its invaluable immunities. (Marg. Ref. z.)—They were also called, and in profession come, to hear the voice of that God, as a Saviour and a Father, who was the impartial, omniscient, omnipotent, and righteous "Judge of all," and by whom all unbelievers would be condemned to everlasting punishment: yea, they were invited to share the blessedness of "the spirits of just men made perfect;" even of all the company of ancient believers, and of those who had died since the coming of Christ, and had thus been made perfect in holiness and felicity.—This is a most decisive proof, that the souls of believers enter into a state of perfect happiness when they die, as far as it can consist with their state of separation from the body.—Christians were also convened, as it were, to hear the voice of God, speaking to them by "Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant." This was founded on better promises, and ratified by nobler blood, than the covenant mediated by Moses; even by the shedding of that blood, through the application of which, the conscience, the heart, and the duties of sinners were cleansed, and "the heavenly things themselves were purified;" of which all the sprinklings of blood under the law had been mere shadows. (Notes, 9:11—26. 10:1—22. 13:20, 21.) Not only was this blood more efficacious, than that of bulls and goats; but Jesus, by it, having died and risen again, spake far better things than righteous Abel had done: (Note, 11:4.) for, while the blood of Abel called from the ground for vengeance on the murderer; the blood of Christ applied in faith, not only took away the guilt of all other sins, however atrocious, but even that of being his crucifiers; as multitudes of the Hebrews, especially, who had been immediately concerned in that most tremendous crime, could thankfully witness. The national guilt of Israel, therefore, could not preclude them from pardon, through this great atonement; and the Lord invited and commanded them, to believe in the name of his Son, and so to share all the before mentioned inestimable privileges. Let them therefore see to it, as they valued his favor, and feared his vengeance, that they did not "refuse" the gracious call and proffered salvation of him, who thus spake to them from his "throne of grace," and by "his beloved Son." For if those who refused to obey the voice of God speaking to them on earth, from mount Sinai, by Moses, but rejected his authority and brake his covenant, did not escape condign punishment; much more certainly and severely would those be punished, who turned away, with enmity and contempt, from him who now spake to them from heaven, by the ambassadors of his Son, their Mediator and High Priest in the sanctuary above: (Note, Prov. 1:32,33.) for their guilt and condemnation must be proportioned to the grace and condescension, which they refused and despised. (Notes, 2:1—4. Matt. 3:7—12. John 3:19—21.)—This plainly shows, that by “coming to mount Zion, &c.” the apostle did not mean being true believers; but having the gospel proposed to them, or having made a profession of it. They might therefore be said to “refuse,” and to “turn away” from God, whether they rejected his invitation, or after a time became apostates from Christianity: but men cannot be said to refuse what was never proposed to them.

26 Whose <sup>1</sup> voice then shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, <sup>m</sup> Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven.

27 And this word, Yet once more, <sup>n</sup> signifieth the removing of those things that * are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

29 For <sup>r</sup> our God is a consuming fire.

Note.—The voice of JEHOVAH, from mount Sirai, had been attended with tremendous earthquakes and convulsions: but many ages after that transaction, in an express prediction of the Messiah, God had foretold that he would “once more shake the earth and the heavens also;” (Note, Hag. 2:6—9.) meaning that he would unhinge the whole civil and ecclesiastical state of the Jews, and abolish the Mosaic dispensation, in order to make way for the kingdom of Christ. The expression, “once more,” as referring to the change in the state of the church and the world, which took place by the introduction of the Mosaic dispensation, with the extraordinary events attending that change; and to all other subsequent convulsions of the nation; and looking forward to the still more extraordinary changes, to be introduced at the coming of the Messiah, denoted the total removal of the things shaken, as “of things made,” and constituted after the manner of this lower creation, to endure but for a time. (Notes, Matt. 24:29—35. Mark 13:24—31. Acts 2:14—21.) This “shaking,” however, was to be only “once more,” and then a constitution would be introduced of a heavenly nature, which could not be shaken or “removed,” but should continue to the end, and, in its effects, for ever. As, therefore, those who had embraced the gospel were admitted into “a kingdom which could not be removed;” as others were invited to accept of this benefit, according to the dispensation which was now openly introduced: and as all grace was freely promised to every one who sought it in the appointed way; it was proper to exhort all of them “to have,” that is, to seek for, and so obtain, and hold fast as a treasure, “grace;” that they might serve God, not merely as his professing people, but “acceptably;” as true believers and spiritual worshippers. This they ought to do, not only with joy, confidence, and gratitude; but with “reverence” of his majesty and authority, and a holy fear of deceiving themselves, of falling under his wrath or frown, or of dishonoring his name; as humbly conscious of their unworthiness, weakness, and depravity; and recollecting, that the “God;” whose people they professed to be, was “a consuming Fire” to destroy hypocrites, apostates, and enemies of every kind, however masked or disguised. (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, Nah. 1:2—6.)—The apostle evidently meant some of his expressions for one description of readers, and others for those of a different character; though he left each to make the application to himself: but he peculiarly aimed to convince his countrymen, that unbelievers among them were doomed to the most tremendous vengeance of God, both national and personal; from which there could be no escape, except by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and cleaving to him.—Yet once, &c. (26) The quotation varies both from the Septuagint and the Hebrew. In the latter it is, “Yet once, I will shake the heaven and the earth, &c.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

While prophets, apostles, myrtyrs, and ancient believers sing the praises of our redeeming God; they unitedly testify to us his faithfulness to his promises, and the inestimable preciousness of his salvation; and they exhort us “to lay aside every weight, and to run with patience the race set before us.” We should therefore seriously inquire, what are “the weights” which retard our course; what the sin, or sins, by which we are “most easily beset;” and peculiarly endangered; that we may seek for grace to enable us to “lay aside the one,” and to be upon our guard against all occasions of the other. Many, who seemed to run well, lose the race, through the weight of increasing business, prosperity, and affluence, with the peculiar snares, temptations, connexions, and encumbrances, which spring from that source. This seems the easily besetting sin of these days of liberty and peace: but all men, in whatever state, have their peculiar dangers and hindrances, against which they are required to watch and pray without ceasing; nor can we "run with patience the race set before us," unless we be crucified to the world, and daily employed in mortifying the whole body of sin, with all its affections and lusts; those especially, to which education, habit, and situation, give most advantage.—We should imagine ourselves surrounded with this "cloud of witnesses," as if spectators of our conduct, animating us to run the race without fainting, and prepared to congratulate our success with adoring acclamations. Yet the eye of our souls should be principally fixed upon "Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our faith;" "from whose fulness they all received," by whose light they shone, and through whose strength they contended, and obtained the victory: and we should turn our attention from all other objects, to fixed contemplation on his ignominious cross, and his glorious throne. The thoughts of the variety of his sufferings, from love to sinners, and his animating example of meekness and patience, cannot fail to exhilarate our drooping spirits, with an assurance of his compassion, and tender regard to our good. We shall then see, that a "joy is set before us" also, at the end of our sorrows, for the sake of which we may cheerfully endure them; we shall perceive that it is reasonable to disregard the reproach and contempt of men, as the divine Saviour bare and sanctified this trial also: and the view of his glorious exaltation will inspire us with confidence in his power, to protect, support, and comfort us, under all that we can suffer for his sake, and to "perfect what concerneth us." (Note, Ps. 138:8.) Let us then frequently "consider him, who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be wearied and faint in our minds." What are our little trials, to his agonies, or even to our deserts? What indeed are they to the sufferings of many of our brethren, in different ages and places? We have "not yet resisted unto blood," in our warfare against sin, as many others have done; and we should be ashamed of our murmurings and impatience, when we have so very little even apparent reason of complaint. (Note, Jer. 12:5,6.)

V. 5—13.

While we "look to Jesus," to reconcile us to suffering, to set us against sin, and to eclipse the vain splendor of this worthless world; we should also learn to receive every affliction, which the malice or envy of men brings upon us, as a correction sent by our wise and gracious Father, who speaketh to us by his word interpreting his providential dispensations, "as to children;" and calls on us neither to "despise his chastisements, nor to faint under" them. We should consider them as precious favors, needful blessings, pledges of love, and the only spiritual good, which he has promised to give us, without our praying for it. He never fails to chasten his children; though he often permits hypocrites to remain unmolested, because he means to destroy them. He will neglect the education of none, whom he receives into his family; and he sets us an example, how we should correct our children, "not for our pleasure, but for their profit," not from passion, but in wise affection. Thus he "makes us partakers of his holiness," that we may be meet to share his felicity. Let us then endeavor to receive chastening from "the Father of our spirits," as we expect our children to submit to our corrections. These momentary sorrows will be over in a few days: and though for the present they "seem not to be joyous, but grievous;" yet we shall afterwards experience the benefit and comfort of them in "the peaceable fruits of righteousness," which have been produced and matured, by our being exercised with them. Thus medicines yield the pleasant sensations of health, when the nauseous taste is forgotten; and delicious poisons cause extreme agony, when the relish of them is gone for ever. Let us then comfort ourselves and each other with these topics; that we may "lift up the hands which hang down, and confirm the feeble knees;" and let us carefully remove obstacles out of the way of pilgrims, and look well to the weak and tempted; lest they should be turned out of the way; instead of being encouraged to persevere in the course, amidst all its roughness and difficulty.

V. 14—17.

To avoid stumbling-blocks and offences, we should "follow peace with all men," and leave no proper means untried to avoid contention; which numbers delight to kindle, and blow into a flame. As far as we can go, without sacrificing truth or duty, we shall find, that "peace with men," of all parties and descriptions, will be favorable to our pursuit of holiness; (Note, Rom. 12:17—21.) without which no man of any sect or sentiment can enter heaven; or enjoy the favor of God; or be capable of delighting in him, and his presence, worship, and service. Let us then "look diligently to ourselves," that we be not deceived by notions or forms, and "come short of the grace of God;" and let us watch over each other, that "no root of bitterness" may spring up in our congregations, or families, to disturb the peace of them, and to defile the souls of many. Those lax notions, especially, must be zealously opposed, which give allowance to the flesh, from a perversion of evangelical principles; for "a little of this leaven" will suffice to "leaven a whole lump." All professors of the gospel should remember profane Esau: for they will all be tempted, more or less, to sell their birth-right for worldly pleasure or advantage. But the time is at hand, when those, who thus renounce or refuse the salvation of God, for carnal indulgence or interest, would be glad to "inherit the blessing," and will be rejected; no place will be found for reversing the fatal bargain, though they should "seek it carefully with tears;" nor can any one, who wilfully rejects the gospel, or deliberately refuses to comply with its exhortations, for the love of this present world, know to what obduracy and desperation he may be given up, in the righteous judgment of God.

V. 18—29.

We have abundant cause for joy and gratitude, that we are not left under the terror and curse of the broken covenant of works, or under the darkness of the legal dispensation. The most holy man must "tremble," yea despair, if he were to be judged according to the law given from mount Sinai; and the vengeance of God would be far more tremendous, than "the fire and tempest" there witnessed. But while we bless God, who speaks to us from the mercy-seat, and calls us to partake of the privileges of Zion's citizens, and the happiness of angels and glorified saints, through "Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," and the sprinkling of his precious blood; let us see to it, that we have good evidence of our "names being written in heaven," with those of true disciples, and not merely on earth with those of professed Christians. Let us remember that our cause must be tried by "God, the Judge of all," who will determine whether we do, or do not, belong to "the church of the first-born;" and let it be noted, that whilst the blood of Jesus speaks nothing but mercy to the most atrocious sinner, who truly believes; it will call for severer vengeance on those, who neglect, pervert, or despise it, than that of Abel did on his murderer Cain. Let all then see to it, that "they do not refuse him, who speaketh to them from heaven," with infinite tenderness and love; lest they should fall from a greater height of privilege to a more tremendous depth of condemnation, than ancient rebels did: for how can they escape, who turn away from God in unbelief or apostacy, whilst he so graciously "beseeches them to be reconciled to him," and to accept of his everlasting favor?—No other dispensation is now to be introduced, till the consummation of all things; "the kingdom," which we are called to receive, "can never be moved;" the inheritance of believers is secured against all enemies and disasters; all things, pertaining to salvation, are freely given in answer to prayer: let us then seek for "grace, that we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear;" remembering that "he is greatly to be feared in the assembly of his saints;" and that he is "a consuming Fire," especially to hypocrites, apostates, and despisers of his great salvation.

CHAP. XIII.

Exhortations to brotherly love, hospitality, and compassion; to chastity, contentment, and trust in God, 1—3; to recollect the faith, examples, and happy end of deceased pastors, 4—7; remembering that Christ is unchangeable and eternal, 8; to watchfulness against false doctrines, regard to the sacrifice of Christ, willingness to hear reproach for him, thanksgivings to God, liberality to men, subjection to vigilant and faithful teachers, and prayer for the apostle, 9—13. An earnest prayer to the "God of peace," through the great Shepherd, and the blood of his covenant, for the Hebrews; and concluding salutations, 20—25.

3 Remember<sup>d</sup> them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them<sup>e</sup> which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body.

Note.—The Hebrew converts, after the day of Pentecost, abounded in love to each other, and in all the fruits of this holy affection: (Notes, Acts 2:42—47. 4:32—35.) but many things would naturally occur to interrupt that entire harmony, and to stop the current of that liberality, which they at first showed. It was therefore peculiarly proper for the apostle to exhort them to "let brotherly love, continue," and to avoid every thing which interfered with their persevering attention to peace, kindness, and reciprocal affection; as became children of one family, and heirs of the same inheritance. He likewise meant to excite them to "brotherly love" towards the Gentile converts, against whom they were generally in some degree prejudiced. (Notes, Eph. 2:11—22. 3:1—7. 4:1—6.) In particular, he exhorted them "not to forget to entertain strangers;" especially such as were driven or had travelled from home, for the sake of the gospel; and who in general were destitute of other accommodation, and dependent on the hospitality of their brethren, though not personally known by them. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:2. 1 Pet. 4:9—11. 3 John 5—8.) To encourage this kind of charity, he reminded them, that some "had entertained angels unawares," as Abraham and Lot. (Notes, Gen. 18: 19.)—It has been shown, that one of the three who came to Abraham was called JEHOVAH, and was doubtless the eternal Word and Son of God: but it was not necessary for the apostle to advert to that circumstance, when he merely suggested a hint on the subject.—It could not indeed be expected that the Hebrews would literally be visited by angels, in the form of strangers; but by hospitality to their brethren, for Christ's sake, they in fact received him, and would be rewarded accordingly: (Notes, Matt. 10:40—42. 25:34—40.) and even, if they were mistaken in the character of those strangers to whom they showed this kindness, their intentions would in no wise fail of a gracious recompense.—Many of their brethren also were "bound" in prison, for the sake of the gospel: and they ought to remember the hardships endured by such sufferers, as if they were imprisoned along with them; that they might be excited to adopt every method of alleviating their sorrows, or procuring their release. In short, whatever adversity any of their brethren were exposed to, in their persons, connexions, or circumstances; they ought to sympathize with them, and endeavor to relieve them: recollecting that "they themselves were still in the body," and liable to similar afflictions; and that they would, in that case, reasonably expect the soothing, lenient care of their brethren.—All captives and afflicted persons might be included in the exhortation; but "the household of faith" was specially intended.

hortation; "Let marriage be honorable in all things, &c." and doubtless the apostle meant, that it ought to be entered into, and behaved in, according to the holy commandments of God; that it might be honorable to the persons themselves, and to their profession of the gospel; as well as that the state should be had in honor, and considered as undefiled. The particle but, however, introducing the second clause, shows that his primary meaning was to assert, that "marriage" in itself "was honorable in all" things, and in all persons, and "the bed undefiled" as to its own nature, though not incapable of abuse: for he contrasts marriage with the conduct of fornicators and adulterers, whom God will certainly judge, and condemn for their violations of his law. (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Notes, 1 Cor. 5:9—13. 6:9—11. Gal. 5:19—21. Eph. 5:3—7. Rev. 21:5—8. 22:14, 15.) Some persons, in the primitive times, contended for the lawfulness of fornication; and most abominable sentiments and practices, in respect of polygamy and divorcees, prevailed, not only among the Gentiles, but even to an astonishing degree among the Jews: while, on the other hand, some of both, and of the Christians, condemned marriage, or at least deemed it a less holy state than celibacy. This "mystery of iniquity" very early began to work: and the apostle, in a few most expressive words, guarded against both the extremes; which experience has always proved to be, in different forms, but almost equally, destructive to morality, the welfare of society, and the purity of religion. 5 Let your <sup>i</sup> conversation be without covetousness; <sup>k</sup> and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, <sup>l</sup> I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.

Note.—The Hebrews were generally poor; many had sold their estates to relieve their brethren, after the day of Pentecost; and the goods of others had been plundered by their persecutors. (10:34.)—The apostle had strenuously exerted himself to procure them a liberal relief from the Gentile churches: (Notes, Rom. 15:22—29. 2 Cor. 8:9:) but he here exhorts them, to let their whole conduct, discourse, and manner of life, be evidently at a distance from "covetousness:" neither being anxious about getting money, to lay up, or to expend in superfluities; nor yet to be tenacious of what they had, or averse to lay it out for valuable purposes. On the contrary, it was proper for them to be "content," well satisfied, and pleased, with "such things as they had" at present, though mean, scanty, or precarious:

assured that infinite wisdom and love chose their portion for them; and remembering the promise of God, that "he would not in any wise leave them;" nor in any wise, on any account, in any emergency, or at any time would he forsake them. The emphasis of the original words, in which five negatives are used to increase the strength of the negation, according to the Greek idiom, can scarcely be retained in a translation. The words seem to be quoted from the Lord's address to Joshua, (Josh. 1:5.) though nearly the same are used in several parts of the scripture. (Marg. Ref. l.)—They, however, evidently show that every believer, in similar circumstances, may rely upon the promises made specially to any person, as recorded in the scripture. The Hebrews, therefore, cleaving to the Lord and his service, in the depth of poverty, and in the midst of persecutions, might say with confidence, "The Lord is my Helper," according to the frequent language of the Psalmist: and they might be assured, that he would protect, provide for, and comfort them, in all possible emergencies; and never forsake them, in life or death, but bring them safe to his heavenly rest and glory: and in this confidence, they need not fear what men could do, in any way, to impoverish, distress, or injure them. Note.—To encourage the patience and perseverance of the Hebrews, even unto a violent death, if that should be set before them; the apostle called on them to "remember such as had presided over them," and spoken the word of God to them, but had been removed by martyrdom; as Stephen, and James whom Herod beheaded, and several others; or, indeed, of those who had died in any other way. They ought carefully to recollect the instructions and behavior of their deceased pastors, to adhere to the doctrines which they had delivered, and to copy their vigorous faith and constant obedience: considering, especially, the conclusion of their course, and the manner in which they departed out of the world; and thinking of the composure and holy joy, with which they met the stroke of death, with whatever circumstances of torture or ignominy it was attended. (Note, Acts 7:54-60.) For if they would "end their conversation," or their Christian course of obedience, in the same happy and honorable manner; they must follow their example, and adhere to their doctrine and instructions.—These useful and excellent ministers had indeed been removed; but Jesus Christ, the great Head of the church, was "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" equally merciful, faithful, and all-sufficient. (Notes, 1:10-12. Rev. 1:4-6,8-11.) As "the Son of God," he was possessed of all possible perfection from eternity; he had continued to exercise those perfections for the good of the church, through all preceding ages; nor was he less perfect and powerful, when "manifested in the flesh," to purchase the church with his "own blood." He continued the same, when exalted in human nature to the mediatorial throne; and when he shall come to judge the world, he will exhibit the same divine perfections and glory; and in like manner to all eternity. (Notes, Matt. 25:31-46. Mark 8:38. Rev. 20:11-15.) The expression seems to be a periphrasis of immortality, a divine attribute incommunicable to a mere creature: his Person is as immutable as his doctrine, his justice and holiness as his mercy and truth, and all kinds of persons will meet a Judge exactly of the same character, as he manifested when he appeared on earth as a Saviour. The Hebrews might, therefore, confide in him, to support and comfort them under their sufferings for his sake; even as he had supported those, who had so happily finished their course.—"That the apostle speaks here, not of 'their living, but dead guides, will appear, partly from his exhortation to remember them, 'the living guides being the objects, not of their 'memory, but sense; partly from the phrase, "'have spoken," which intimates, that they had 'now left off speaking; and partly, from the εξ-ἄουτος, or close of their conversation on earth." Whitby.

Note.—The apostle exhorted the Hebrews to "trust in Christ," and cleave to him, according to the instructions of their deceased teachers; and, not "to be carried about with divers and strange doctrines," as the clouds are driven by the wind. (Note, Eph. 4:14-16.) Many innovations had been introduced by different descriptions of false teachers, which were all foreign to the simplicity of Christianity: but Christians should especially seek to have their hearts "established" in a single dependence on the grace and mercy of God in Christ; and in the experience of the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, which would both comfort them, and render them steadfast against every delusion. Whereas, if they paid any particular attention to distinctions of meats, or rested in the legal sacrifices and peace-offerings, (on part of which the offerer and his friends feasted before God, as at peace with him;) they would not arrive at stability. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, 9:8-14. 1 Tim. 4:1-10.) They could not indeed expect spiritual profit from such observances; seeing that they, who had heretofore been occupied in them, and had looked no further, had derived no saving benefit from them; and now they were abolished. But true believers had, in the atonement of Christ, the substance of all which had been shadowed forth, by the sacrifices of the law. The flesh of many of these had been divided between the altar and the priests, who alone were allowed to eat the most holy things. But such of the Hebrews, as continued to minister at the tabernacle or temple, and neglected the gospel, had not the privilege of participating with Christians in feasting upon their spiritual sacrifice: of this the Lord's supper was the appointed memorial, and might perhaps be alluded to. (Notes, John 6:47-58. 1 Cor. 5:6-8. 10:14-22.) An intimation of this seems to have been implied, in the prohibition of the priest's eating any part of the most solemn sin-offerings, the blood of which was carried into the most holy place, on the day of atonement, to expiate the guilt of the nation; for these sin-offerings were ordered to be burned altogether, "without the camp." (Notes, Ex. 29:13,14. Lev. 4: 6:30. 16:) Wherefore Jesus also, that he might set apart and consecrate to God his people, to be a spiritual priesthood, by shedding his own blood, as their "Sin-offering," previously to his entrance with it for them into the heavenly sanctuary; suffered death, not within the precincts of the temple, or even in the holy city, but without the gate, upon mount Calvary. Thus he was, as it were, cast out of the camp as accursed: that he might appear to be the true "Sin-offering," of which all others were the types. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Gal. 3:6—14.) It was, therefore, requisite for believers to renounce all dependence on the legal sacrifices, and the service of the sanctuary, to follow Christ. They ought also most willingly, for his sake, to "bear the reproach" cast upon them on that account; and submit to be excommunicated and vilified by the persecuting priests and scribes; going after Christ out of the camp of Israel, and enduring every indignity for his sake, and after his example. (*Notes, Is. 51:7,8. 66:5,6. Matt. 10:21—26,32,33. Mark 8:38. John 15:17—21. 15 <sup>b</sup> By him therefore let us offer <sup>i</sup> the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, <sup>k</sup> the fruit of our lips, * giving thanks to his name.

Note.—The Hebrews needed no atoning sacrifices, except that of Christ: and therefore, living on him by faith, they might disregard the legal oblations, and offer, at a distance from the temple, more acceptable sacrifices than burnt-offerings, or peace-offerings; if, through the mediation of the great High Priest, they presented to God their continual and fervent praises and thanksgivings, adoring his manifested perfections, celebrating his wonderful works, and gratefully acknowledging his abundant loving-kindness towards them. This "fruit of their lips" would be more pleasing and honorable to him, than the fruits of the land, or the firstlings of their cattle. (Notes, Ps. 50:22,23. Phil. 1:9—11. Col. 3:16,17. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) At the same time they ought not to forget, or neglect, to do good to their indigent brethren, and others in distress, by communicating to them according to their ability: for "with such sacrifices," when offered from a principle of humble faith and love, "God would be well pleased;" as they were a proper expression of their gratitude to him, very honorable to the gospel, and beneficial to mankind, and were the fruits of his grace in their hearts. (Notes, 6:9, 10. 2 Cor. 9:12—15. Phil. 4:14—20.)

Fruit of our lips. (15) Καθ' ὅσον καρδίας. *Hos. 14:2. 17 ° Obey them that † have the rule over you, and <sup>p</sup> submit yourselves: for they <sup>q</sup> watch for your souls, as they that must <sup>r</sup> give account, that they may do it <sup>s</sup> with joy, and not <sup>t</sup> with grief: for that is unprofitable for you.

Note.—The apostle, as "a debtor to all men," had written to the Hebrews, to establish them in the truth; and he had called on them to remember and follow the faith of their deceased pastors. (Note, 7,8.) But he would also remind them, that they ought to obey those pious teachers and guides who now presided over them, and to "submit" to their instructions, admonitions, and reproofs, as ruling them with spiritual authority derived from the Lord Jesus. For they were appointed to "watch for their souls," and to guard and caution them, against all those errors and sins, which might endanger them. (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Ez. 3:17—21. 33:2—9. Matt. 24:45—51. Acts 20:24—28. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) They performed this important and difficult service, as men who "must give account" for every part of their conduct, to him who employed them: so that they could not deliver their own souls, without great vigilance, diligence, faithfulness, and impartiality, which would often constrain them to displease men. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:1—5. 1 Thes. 5:12—15. 1 Tim. 5:17,18.) The people ought therefore to obey the word of God as spoken by them, and submit to his authority as exercised by them: that they might be able to give up their "account with joy," having been successful in their labors; and not with grief and anguish of heart, because of the untractable conduct of those to whom they had been sent; which would not be for the profit of those who occasioned grief to their faithful pastors, but infinitely injurious to them. This must principally relate to the account given before the Lord, as it were, from day to day, with joy or grief, by ministers, of the reception given to their message: for no misconduct of the people will occasion sorrow to the faithful servant of Christ, at the final day of retribution; though their salvation will be unto them "a crown of rejoicing." (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:14—17. 1 Thes. 2:17—20.) The exhortation supposes the faithfulness of ministers and ecclesiastical rulers, and that they exercise a scriptural authority in a proper manner: for no obedience and submit

Note.—It is plain, from these verses, that the persons immediately addressed, or to whom in the first instance the epistle was sent, would know from whom it came. The apostle desired them to pray for him and his fellow-laborers, as well as for their own pastors; for, however he had been calumniated or suspected by his nation, and however many of his Hebrew brethren had been prejudiced against him; (Note, Acts 21:20—26.) yet he trusted that he "had a good conscience," tender and duly informed; and that he was willing and desirous in all things, and among all persons, to act with integrity, and in a becoming manner. He therefore entreated their prayers for his protection, comfort, and success; but especially, that the providence of God would order things in such a manner, as to enable him to come among them the sooner. For he was persuaded many of them would be glad to see him; and he purposed to come, as soon as he had fully regained his liberty, and had opportunity, notwithstanding all that he had suffered in consequence of his last journey to Jerusalem. It is not known whether he accomplished this purpose, or not. (Note, Acts 21:27—40.) "That I may be 'quickly restored to you from this confinement, and have an opportunity of rendering you 'those services, which were prevented by this 'unjust imprisonment, occasioned by the fury 'of the populace, when I was last at Jerusalem.' Doddridge. The priests, rulers, and council were more deeply criminal than even 'the populace.'—Good conscience. (18) Notes, Acts 23:1—5. 24:10—21. 2 Cor. 1:12—14. 5:9—12. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.

brews in his behalf, the apostle gave them a compendium of his most fervent supplications for them. He addressed himself to the Lord; as "the God of peace," (a title, never used but in St. Paul's epistles, Marg. Ref. a.) reconciled to believers, and ready to be at peace with all sinners, who came to him in the appointed way; as the Author of spiritual peace in the hearts and consciences of his people; and the 'Lover of peace and concord,' in the church and among mankind; who "had brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep," from whom all pastors derived their authority. Jesus, the great Proprietor of the chosen flock, to whom they had been given, had laid down his life to atone for their sins, and he continually sought them, and brought them home to his fold, where he protected and fed them. (Notes, Ps. 23: Is. 53:6. Ez. 34:23—31. Luke 15:1—6. John 10:10—18. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) In order to show that his ransom was accepted, and that he might perform his gracious work, as "the great Shepherd of his sheep;" God the Father had raised him from the dead, "through the blood of the everlasting covenant." For this may either refer to the reconciled love of God to his people, through the blood of Christ; or to his being brought again from the dead, because his sacrifice was sufficient and accepted, that so he might become "the Shepherd of the sheep;" or to the blessings for which the apostle prayed, and which were bestowed "through the blood of the everlasting covenant;" all these things may be contained in the words; and it is not obvious to determine which was principally intended. The blood of Christ purchased the blessings of the new covenant, and ratified it as unalterable: so that it was rendered perpetual on earth to the end of time, and everlasting in respect of the salvation conferred according to it.—The apostle earnestly entreated "the God of peace," through the mediation of the great Shepherd, and on account of "the blood of the covenant," that he would make the Hebrews "perfect in every good work to do his will;" rectifying every disorder of their souls, and completely fitting them for every part of his "holy service; working in them" by his new-creating grace, "that which was well-pleasing in his sight," being according to his law and image, and for his glory, and therefore acceptable with him through Jesus Christ; (Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) to whom, even to "the God of peace," he ascribed eternal glory. (Marg. Ref.)—He prayed for them, under the full persuasion, that sanctifying grace, and holy obedience, would surely be attended with divine consolations, which he did not particularly mention. Note.—The apostle, as not being immediately placed over the Hebrews, or disposed to speak to them in an authoritative style, entreated them to take in good part "the word of exhortation," warning, and encouragement, which he had sent them, from love to their souls: for he had written a letter to them, in few words, compared with the vast importance, and the great variety, of the subjects discussed in it.—Timothy had, it seems, been confined in prison for preaching the gospel, of which the Hebrews had heard; but the writer informed them that he was at length set at liberty, and that he purposed to come with Timothy to see them, if he were not delayed. It appears hence that the apostle either was at liberty, or had a clear prospect of being speedily liberated: and that the spurious postscript falsely says, that Timothy was the bearer of the epistle. When the argumentative part of the epistle had been read, without the prejudices which the writer's name, in the beginning, would have unavoidably excited: these intimations at the close would have no bad effect.—After this, he concluded with salutations, especially to the pastors and rulers of their churches; and from all the Christians in Italy, as well as those at Rome.

Them that have the rule, &c. (24) Τῶς ἡγουμένων. 7.17. Luke 22:26. (Notes, 7,8,17.) The pastors of the church are evidently thus distinguished from the people; but it must be allowed, that no disparity among the pastors is intimated. The apostle James was probably living at this time; and was the principal, though not the only person intended. (Notes, Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

"Brotherly love" tends, in such various ways, to the benefit of the church, the comfort of believers, and the honor of the gospel; that the enemy of our souls endeavors, by every means, to interrupt its exercise, and to work upon the remains of our corrupt affections, for that purpose, with a vast variety of most subtle artifices, against which we should be perpetually upon our guard. Hence it is, that so little of this love is found in the church, though so much is read concerning it in the scriptures; and that so many divisions and controversies prevail among those, who seem, in a measure, to have been taught of God to love their brethren!

(Notes, John 13:31—35. 17:20—23. 1 Thes. 4:9—12. 1 John 2:7—11. 3:11—24. 4:9—12.)—We best consult our own interest, when we are mindful to use hospitality, and to relieve or entertain our poor brethren, even though they be strangers to us: for thus we entertain Christ himself, whom all angels worship and obey.—When we are exempted from imprisonment, or other grievous adversities, we should take care not to "forget," how many are thus oppressed and bowed down; that we may sympathize with them in their sorrows, and help or comfort them according to our ability; never forgetting to pray for them, in which the poorest and those far distant may give them most valuable assistance: for it behoves us to be aware that we are liable to the same distresses, as long as we are in the body.—Defilement and dishonor spring from contrariety to the law of God, which is perfectly suited to promote our present and future welfare: "marriage" therefore "is honorable in all;" nor can any defilement attach to it, except when the letter or spirit of God's commandments is violated by men's behavior respecting it. But God does, in this world, severely mark his abhorrence of those forbidden lusts, to which the depravity of the human heart leads such vast multitudes; (Notes, Gen. 2:24. 1 Cor. 6:18—20.) and he will surely condemn every impenitent fornicator and adulterer at the day of judgment; whatever disguise or excuse he may here use to cloke his wickedness.—Christians, whether poor or rich, should, in all their words and actions, show that they "abhor covetousness." Having in heaven inexhaustible treasures, they should be well satisfied with mean accommodations here: and, as God has promised "that he will never leave them, and in no case forsake them;" they have no cause to court the favor or fear the frown of men, or to dread the want of things needful; but may courageously say, "The LORD is my Helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me."—The instructions and example of ministers, who have honorably and comfortably closed their testimony, should be peculiarly remembered by their survivors. At death, they, as it were, give their last attestation to their doctrine and exhortations; and the happy event of their trials calls on others to "follow their faith," and to consider the joyful end of their course; and all ministers ought to have a peculiar respect to this during their whole lives. But Jesus alone is an everliving Friend, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Still he fills the hungry, encourages the trembling, and welcomes penitents of every class; still he rejects proud Pharisees, abhors painted sepulchres, and teaches all whom he saves, to "love righteousness and to hate iniquity;" and having called them by his grace, he will love them unchangeably, and for ever. Indeed all those, and those alone, will "abide the day of his coming" to judge the world, who would have met with favor from him, when he taught as "the Man of sorrows" on earth.

about with divers and strange doctrines," and diligently seek to have our hearts "established by grace." for notions and forms never profit those who are occupied in them. Living by faith in Christ, and being consecrated to God through his blood, let us willingly separate from this evil world, and "bear the reproach" of proud formalists, and all the enemies of true religion however distinguished. "We have here no continuing city;" our pilgrimage will soon end; let us then seek an abiding mansion in the city of our God, and consider all temporal prosperity or adversity, as of scarcely any consequence; being of a transient and evanescent nature. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:29—31, 2 Cor. 4:13—18, 1 Pet. 4:7.) Being "a spiritual priesthood," let us solace ourselves in this evil world, by "offering to God, through Jesus Christ," our "continual sacrifice of praise, even the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name." This, joined with the acceptable sacrifice of liberally and actively doing good to men, for the Lord's sake, will be a sweet anticipation of the joys of heaven, and a preparation for its work and worship.

All ministers of the gospel should peculiarly remember, that they are called "to watch for men's souls, as those who must give account;" which involves the most weighty and awful responsibility: for dreadful will be their condemnation, if they be slothful, selfish, or unfaithful. Christians should "obey and submit to" their faithful pastors, and take in good part their loving admonitions; that they may give up their account "with joy, and not with grief;" for if such pastors lose their labor, their hearers will lose their souls. Christians should also pray fervently and constantly for their ministers, and for all who sustain that sacred character: for these would generally walk more honorably, and labor more successfully, if the people were more earnest in praying for them. Even when they see, or think they see, something amiss in those who upon the whole "have a good conscience, willing in all things to live honestly;" they should pray the more frequently and earnestly for them. Let us then approach "the God of peace, who brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep;" and, "through the blood of the everlasting covenant," let us beseech him for ourselves and each other, "to make us perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ;" that we may glorify him for ever. Then every word of exhortation, and every dispensation of Providence will do us good; the communion of saints will be maintained, and "grace will be with us all," till it be completed in glory. Amen.

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

JAMES, the son of Alphaeus, the brother of Jude, and the near relation of our Lord, called also "James the less," probably being lower in stature, or younger, than the other James, is generally allowed to have been the writer of this epistle; (Notes, Matt. 13:54—58. Luke 24:13—24.) and the few who have doubted of this, have assigned very slight reasons for their hesitation. It is recorded in ecclesiastical history, and the Acts of the apostles confirm the fact, that he generally resided at Jerusalem, superintending the concerns of the churches in that city, and in the neighboring places, to the end of his life; which was terminated by martyrdom, the circumstances of which are differently related.—He seems to have written this epistle only a short time before his death; and it is supposed by some, that the sharp rebukes and awful warnings, given in it to his countrymen, stirred up that persecuting rage, which terminated his life: but indeed, it is peculiarly wonderful, that he should have been preserved so many years, in so perilous a situation; and it can be accounted for, only by ascribing it to the Lord's immediate protection. The epistle is styled general, or catholic, because it was not addressed to any particular church, but to the Jewish converts, throughout their dispersions; indeed with most evident reference also to the unconverted part of the nation. This title, however, is not coeval with the epistle; but was prefixed to it some ages after it was written; and to the subsequent epistles, in several instances with manifest impropriety. It is probable, that the apostle, by means of the elders and Christians at Jerusalem, circulated copies of this epistle, by those strangers who came to the sacred festivals, from the several cities and countries where the Jews resided, and especially where Jewish converts to Christianity were found: and, as it was exclusively addressed to his countrymen, it seems for a long season to have been little known among the Gentile converts; so that its authenticity was doubted for a considerable time.—While the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which was made in the beginning of the second century, for the use of converted Jews, this Epistle of James hath found a place therein.—This is an argument of great weight: for certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity, than the converted Gentiles to whom it was not sent; and who perhaps had no opportunity of being acquainted with it, till long after it was written.'

Maeknight.—It is cited by Clemens Romanus four several times; and by Ignatius, in his 'genuine epistle to the Ephesians; by Origen, in his thirteenth homily upon Genesis. Eusebius saith, It was known to most, and publicly read in most Christian churches: St. Jerom, that 'in process of time it obtained authority. Esthius notes, That they who before doubted of it, 'in the fourth century embraced the opinion of them who received it: and from thence no 'church, no ecclesiastical writer, is found who ever doubted of it. But, on the contrary, all 'the catalogues of the books of the holy scripture, published by general and provincial councils, Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, number it among the canonical scriptures.' Whitby.—'It appears to me, that the authority of this, and some other parts of the New 'Testament, having been early questioned by some primitive churches, affords an argument 'of their peculiar caution, that no other writings should be admitted into the sacred canon, 'however excellent, besides those which had an undoubted claim to that distinction; and justly 'challenges our deference to their judgment, who doubtless were most capable of deciding, 'and gave sufficient evidence of their care, as well as their capacity. The epistle before us, 'having passed through a severe and accurate scrutiny, appears to have been universally 'received; and accordingly has been transmitted down to the present age, as an authentic part 'of the oracles of God.' Doddridge.—It is generally known, that Luther, in the earlier part of the reformation, spoke rather in a slighting manner of this epistle, groundlessly supposing that it contradicted St. Paul's doctrine, in the grand subject of justification; but deeper experience, more exact investigation, more extensive observation, and a maturer judgment, induced him to retract his opinion: and at present no further doubt seems to be entertained, among orthodox Christians, as to its divine inspiration and authority. It is not, however, so replete with the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, as St. Paul's epistles are in general; or, indeed, as the other apostolical epistles: for it is supposed to have been written with a special design of counteracting the false teachers, who, in different ways, perverted those doctrines, and wrested them to their own destruction, and that of other men. But the grand principles of Christianity are throughout taken for granted, and it will be found, on attentive consideration, entirely coincident with even St. Paul's doctrine, concerning grace and justification; though at the first glance it may appear discordant: and it abounds with most important exhortations to the patience of hope, and the obedience of faith and love; with which various very needful warnings, reproofs, and encouragements, are interspersed, according to the different characters of the persons addressed in it.

CHAP. I.

The apostle addresses "the twelve tribes, which were scattered abroad," 1. He exhorts them to joyful patience under trials, 2—4; and to ask wisdom of God in faith, with an unwavering mind, 5—8. He counsels the poor and the rich, 9—11; and shows the happiness prepared for those who endure, 12. Men are tempted to sin, not by God, but by their own lusts, 13—15. Every good gift comes from the unchangeable God, of which good gifts regeneration is especially mentioned, 16—18. Cautions against pride, toquidity, anger, and malice, 19, 20; admonitions to receive the word of God in meekness, and to reduce it to practice, 21—23. The necessity of bridling the tongue, 26. The nature of true religion, 27.

Note.—It is probable, that the apostolical authority of James was not disputed, among those whom he more immediately addressed; so that he waved the mention of it, and only styled himself "the servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." (Marg. Ref. b.)—It appears from the Acts of the apostles, as well as from historical records, that he resided chiefly at Jerusalem; and he is said to have been the first bishop of that church. This indeed is spoken inaccurately; for he certainly possessed far more than episcopal authority, however that may be defined; and surely it could be no preferment to an apostle, to be appointed a diocesan bishop! He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom, not very long after writing

[this epistle, though the date of that event is uncertain.—He addressed himself "to the twelve tribes," which were considered as still existing, though "scattered" by various calamities, and from different motives, into many distant nations of the earth; but he principally intended the Christians among them: and he simply greeted them, or wished them health and peace, without using the benedictions which introduce most of the other epistles.—Scattered.] 'That is, to all the believing Jews, 'of whatever tribe, who were dispersed over 'the earth; to whom it is probable, James, remaining still at Jerusalem, sent this epistle, by 'those who were used to meet at that city from 'all nations, at the festivals.' Beza.—Some of all the other tribes still subsisted, as distinct from the Gentiles, and as generally incorporated with the descendants of Judah: and the nation was dispersed abroad in almost all parts of the known world; as it is evident from the scriptures themselves, as well as from the testimony of ancient writers. (Marg. Ref. d.)—Greeting.] James, who probably drew up the epistle of the council at Jerusalem, to the Gentile converts, there uses the same word. (Notes, Acts 15:22—29.)
